Chapter 18: The State, the Government, and You

Paper 5 — (progressively harder)

Subject	Social Science (NCERT Class 7)
Chapter	18 — The State, the Government, and You
Total Questions	60 (Multiple Choice, single correct)
Maximum Marks	240
Suggested Time	90 minutes

Marking scheme: +4 for each correct answer · -1 for each wrong answer · 0 if unattempted.

Instructions: Each question has four options (A), (B), (C), (D); exactly one is correct.

Apex traps: treating one part (government) as the enduring whole (state); smuggling an organ, role, or tier into the four PARTS; mistaking the holders of force (police/army) or the exam-selected bureaucracy for 'the government'; assuming democracy and republic are the same axis (UK = democracy, not republic; a one-party state can be a republic, not a democracy); believing a numerical majority overrides constitutional rights and the rule of law; confusing matsya nyaya with equality; swapping who-makes vs who-enforces vs who-interprets; treating judicial review as law-making; reading accountability (RTI/media/voting/grievance redressal) as judicial review or sovereignty; and mistaking decentralisation/federalism for centralised, foreign, or abolished power. Do not write on this paper — mark answers on your answer sheet.

1. A newly recognised island has citizens, marked borders, and a cabinet running daily affairs, yet by treaty every law it passes must be approved by a neighbouring power before taking effect. A commentator says, 'It has all four parts of a state, so it is fully a state.' What is the precise flaw in this claim?

(A) The claim is correct, because having a working cabinet automatically supplies sovereignty along with the other three parts

(B) Three parts are present, but sovereignty is incomplete because the final say over its laws lies with an outside power, so it is not yet a full state

(C) It is missing territory, since borders that a neighbour can comment on are not genuine borders

(D) It is missing government, because a cabinet whose laws need approval is not a real government

2. A teacher writes seven items on the board: population, the executive, territory, the regulator role, sovereignty, the local tier, and judicial review. She asks the student to keep only the genuine PARTS of a state. After correctly removing every item that is instead an organ, a role, a tier, or a power, how many items remain and what are they?

(A) Four remain: population, territory, sovereignty and the executive, since the executive is one of the four parts

(B) Four remain: population, territory, sovereignty and judicial review, since the power to review laws is a part

(C) Five remain, because the regulator role and the local tier are also parts of a state

(D) Three remain: population, territory and sovereignty

3. Country Y is governed by Party A, then a coalition, then Party B over thirty years; throughout, its people, borders and self-rule are unchanged, but a long civil archive of its laws keeps growing as old statutes stay in force and new ones are added. A student concludes, 'Because three governments came and went, the country is at most one government-term old, and its laws reset each time.' Identify the TWO errors.

(A) It correctly dates the country to one term, but wrongly says the laws reset; the laws actually do continue

(B) It wrongly treats the changing government as if it were the enduring state, and it wrongly assumes existing laws expire at each handover when in fact they continue until changed

(C) It wrongly says the laws reset, but correctly concludes the country resets, since the state is replaced at each election

(D) Both conclusions are correct, since a new government means both a new state and a fresh body of law

4. Using the chapter's analogy, a school keeps running while its teachers come and go. A student maps it as: 'the school = the government, and the teachers = the state, so when the government (school) is demolished the teachers (state) scatter.' Why is this mapping exactly backwards in its consequence?

(A) The mapping is correct: the school is the government and the teachers are the state, so demolishing the government ends the people

(B) The mapping is wrong only because schools cannot be demolished, not because the labels are swapped

(C) The mapping is right about the labels but wrong to say anything endures, since neither schools nor states last

(D) The school stands for the enduring state and the teachers for the changing government, so the lasting thing is the state, not the staff — the mapping reverses what endures and what changes

5. Country M signs a treaty to align trade standards but keeps the final right to reject any agreed standard; Country N must implement whatever a foreign capital orders; Country P holds free elections but has no treaties at all. Ranking only by FULLNESS OF SOVEREIGNTY, which ordering is correct?

- (A) P is most sovereign, M is less, and N is least, because signing any treaty reduces sovereignty step by step
- (B) N is most sovereign because it follows clear orders, M next, and P least because it lacks treaties
- (C) All three are equally sovereign, since each has a population and a territory
- (D) M and P are both fully sovereign and N is not, because keeping or never surrendering the final say preserves sovereignty while obeying foreign orders removes it

6. A debater argues: 'Sovereignty is just military might — the state with the biggest army can enforce any law, so the strongest army holds the most sovereignty.' Within the same country, the army serves the elected government and never overrules its laws. Which response best uses the chapter to refute the debater?

- (A) Sovereignty is the recognised power to make and enforce one's OWN laws free of outside control; the army is state machinery the government directs, so military strength is a tool of sovereignty, not its measure
- (B) The debater is right, because the army's commander therefore holds the country's sovereignty
- (C) Sovereignty actually means having no army, so the most peaceful state is the most sovereign
- (D) Sovereignty means a foreign power has approved the state's laws, which a large army helps secure

7. After an election the cabinet of ministers is new, while every soldier, police officer and senior clerk stays in post. A losing candidate says, 'Either the election was meaningless because the staff are the same, or those unchanged officers are now the real government.' Which single statement defeats BOTH halves of this dilemma?

- (A) The staff should all have been replaced, so the candidate's first horn is right and the election truly was meaningless
- (B) Because the officers stayed, they are indeed the new government, so the candidate's second horn is right
- (C) The political executive genuinely changed while the permanent state machinery rightly stayed to serve the state, so the election mattered and the unchanged officers are machinery, not the government
- (D) Nothing changed at all, since ministers and permanent staff are simply the same people under different names

8. A diagram shows a large oval P containing four inner shapes; one inner shape Q is split into three slots labelled 'makes', 'enforces', 'interprets'; one of the three slots, R, is further split into 'ministers (change at elections)' and 'exam-selected officers (stay on)'. What do P, Q and R most precisely represent?

- (A) P is the government, Q is the state nested inside it, and R is the legislature with two houses
- (B) P is sovereignty, Q is the territory it covers, and R is the population split into voters and non-voters
- (C) P is the executive, Q is the judiciary inside it, and R is the bureaucracy split into elected and hereditary parts
- (D) P is the state, Q is the government's three organs, and R is the executive split into its political and permanent parts

9. A village council, backed by most residents' votes, orders that a small minority community must pay a special yearly fee that no one else pays. A court strikes the order down. A councillor protests, 'We are the majority and we follow democracy, so our vote is final.' Which combination of chapter ideas most precisely explains why the court could override the vote?

- (A) Decentralisation and federalism, because local bodies must always defer to the union government's preferences
- (B) The provider and regulator roles, because levying a fee is the government supplying and pricing a service
- (C) Sovereignty, because the council exercised the state's power to make and enforce its own laws
- (D) Guaranteed fundamental rights plus the rule of law place limits above a mere majority, and an independent judiciary can strike down even a popular order that violates those rights

10. A leader who won 70% of the vote proposes a law banning a minority faith's worship, saying, 'A supermajority makes any law legitimate.' Officials, police and the leader insist the law binds everyone but themselves. Which pairing of chapter principles most completely refutes the leader's whole position?

- (A) A 70% majority may indeed pass any law, but officials must still obey it, so only the exemption claim is wrong
- (B) Rights and the rule of law set limits no majority may cross, and the rule of law binds even officials and the leader, so neither the supermajority nor the claimed exemption is valid
- (C) Only minorities may decide laws about worship, so the majority had no say in the first place
- (D) Democracies have no laws limiting anyone, so the only error is exempting the officials

11. After a complete collapse of police and courts in a district, armed groups seize property, settle scores by force, and no one can be held to account. A reformer says, 'This is matsya nyaya, and it shows exactly why we built a government.' Which reading is fully correct?

- (A) Matsya nyaya means everyone becomes equal by themselves, so it shows government is unnecessary
- (B) Matsya nyaya means the strong devour the weak, so it shows government under the rule of law exists precisely to maintain order and protect the weak
- (C) Matsya nyaya means the weak overpower the strong, so it shows the strong need a government's protection
- (D) Matsya nyaya means fish should make the laws, so it shows the government replaces natural law

12. A campaigner says: 'A strong leader who overrides the courts and jails critics is fine if crime falls, because results matter more than rules.' Which chapter idea most precisely names the danger, linking two concepts?

- (A) A leader above the courts and free of criticism breaks the rule of law, opening the door to the very domination matsya nyaya describes, since no power then checks the powerful
- (B) There is no danger, because the rule of law simply means whatever a strong leader decides counts as law
- (C) The only danger is that crime might not actually fall, not that any principle has been violated
- (D) The danger is that the courts would then start making the laws instead of the legislature

13. Trace one rule end to end: members debate and vote a road-safety bill into law; exam-selected officials issue district instructions to put it into effect; a driver is taken to court, which decides he broke it; later a different court finds a separate clause of the same law unconstitutional and strikes that clause down. Map the four actions to organs (and executive sub-part) in order.

- (A) Executive; legislature; judiciary; legislature, because making and striking laws are both legislative acts
- (B) Legislature; political executive; legislature; judiciary, because ministers personally apply each law in court
- (C) Legislature (makes); permanent executive/bureaucracy (enforces); judiciary (interprets/applies); judiciary again (judicial review)
- (D) Judiciary; executive; legislature; executive, because courts propose laws the executive later cancels

14. A new minister tells a senior civil servant, 'You owe loyalty to my party — so resign the day we lose office.' The civil servant declines, citing the nature of her post. Which explanation best justifies her refusal AND identifies what would be lost if ministers could sack the whole service each election?

- (A) She should resign, because the bureaucracy is rightly replaced whenever a party loses, refreshing the offices
- (B) She may refuse only because she outranks the minister, and nothing would be lost by sacking the service
- (C) She serves the state, not a party, so she stays across governments; if every official were sacked each election, the state would lose the steady, experienced administration the permanent executive provides
- (D) She makes the country's laws, so she answers to no minister, and replacing officials would simply change the law-makers

15. Country G freely elects both its lawmakers and its president; Country H freely elects its lawmakers but keeps a hereditary monarch as head of state; Country J has an elected president but allows only one party to contest. Classify each on the two independent axes (democracy?, republic?).

- (A) G is a democracy and a republic; H is a democracy but not a republic; J is a republic but not a democracy
- (B) All three are both democracies and republics, since each holds elections of some kind
- (C) G is a democracy and republic; H is a republic but not a democracy; J is a democracy but not a republic
- (D) None is a republic, because a republic also requires free and fair multiparty elections

16. A student claims, 'India became a republic the instant it became a democracy, because the two always arrive together.' A classmate offers four counterexamples. Which counterexample alone is sufficient to disprove the 'always together' claim?

- (A) A military dictatorship with no elections, which is neither a democracy nor a republic
- (B) A long-standing democracy with a hereditary monarch as head of state, which is a democracy yet not a republic
- (C) A country that holds free elections for every office, which is both a democracy and a republic
- (D) A country with a hereditary king who also blocks all elections, which is neither

17. Spain elects a parliament that runs the country but keeps a hereditary king as head of state; an analyst says, 'Spain proves a monarchy can never be democratic.' Which response is correct?

- (A) The analyst is right: keeping a monarch makes free elections impossible, so Spain cannot be a democracy
- (B) Spain is a republic but not a democracy, because the king is its elected head of state

- (C) Spain is neither a democracy nor a republic, since a head of state rules out both
- (D) The analyst is wrong: Spain is a democracy because its people freely elect their government, even though it keeps a monarch and so is not a republic

18. A commentator argues, 'Because India is a democracy, the courts must do whatever the majority's elected government wants; striking down its laws is anti-democratic.' Which two chapter ideas TOGETHER most completely refute this?

- (A) Decentralisation and federalism: sharing power means the courts must follow the centre's elected government
- (B) The provider and protector roles: because the government supplies services and security, the courts must support its laws
- (C) Judicial independence and the rule of law: independent courts can check even the elected government, which, like everyone, is bound by the Constitution, so judicial review upholds democracy rather than opposing it
- (D) Sovereignty and territory: because the state's borders define its laws, the courts must enforce whatever the government passes

19. A losing party complains, 'We won the election, yet the court struck down our flagship law — so the judges are overriding the people's will.' Which response is most accurate AND best explains why this is healthy for democracy?

- (A) The party is right: an elected government's laws may never be reviewed by any court, or democracy is meaningless
- (B) Striking down a law that breaches the Constitution is judicial review upholding the rule of law; even an elected government is bound by the Constitution, which protects everyone's rights from misuse of power
- (C) The court overstepped, because judicial review covers only government actions, never laws passed by an elected majority
- (D) The judges may strike down laws only when the party that passed them lost the next election

20. A school principal during one term does four things: she posts guards to keep students safe; she runs the library and free meals; she sets and enforces fair rules for clubs; and she is chosen by a staff vote every three years. If the principal models the government, which item does NOT correspond to one of the government's three ROLES, and to what does it correspond instead?

- (A) Being chosen by a vote every three years does not match a role; it mirrors how a government is selected through elections, not what it does as protector, provider or regulator
- (B) Running the library and meals does not match a role; it mirrors how a government is elected

(C) Posting guards does not match a role; it mirrors the bureaucracy implementing decisions

(D) Setting and enforcing club rules does not match a role; it mirrors the judiciary interpreting laws

21. A government performs five acts: deploys the navy to guard the coast; opens public clinics; inspects shops for fair pricing; runs a free school-meal scheme; and fines a factory ignoring safety rules. Grouping by role, which statement is exactly correct?

(A) Two acts are protector or provider in kind (coast defence is protector; clinics and meals are provider) and two are regulator (price inspection and the safety fine), with coast defence the lone protector

(B) All five are the regulator role, because each act sets or enforces some kind of rule

(C) Four are provider and one is protector, because clinics, meals, inspections and fines all supply services

(D) Coast defence and the safety fine are both protector, because each keeps people safe from harm

22. A citizen files an RTI request and learns how a contract was awarded; a journalist publishes it; the public demands an inquiry; and at the next election voters remove the government. A textbook calls all four steps 'judicial review.' Why is that label wrong, and what is the correct umbrella idea?

(A) The label is right, because exposing and voting out a government is how courts review laws

(B) None of the four is a court striking down a law; together they are accountability — transparency, a free media, public pressure and voting that hold the government answerable

(C) Only the voting step is accountability; the RTI, media and inquiry steps are forms of judicial review

(D) The correct umbrella is sovereignty, since informing the public and voting are how the state makes its own laws

23. A citizen whose pension was wrongly stopped uses an official complaints channel and has it restored. A friend says, 'That was judicial review — you struck down the rule that stopped it.' Distinguish what actually happened from judicial review.

(A) It was grievance redressal, a form of accountability that fixes a problem with a government service; judicial review is different, being a court's power to strike down laws or actions that breach the Constitution

(B) It was judicial review, because correcting a wrong decision is the same as a court striking down a law

(C) It was sovereignty, because restoring the pension shows the state's power to make and enforce its own laws

(D) It was decentralisation, because solving a local pension problem shifts power to the local tier

24. A teacher lists India's three TIERS, three ORGANS, and three ROLES on the board, then asks a student to point to 'the union tier.' The student instead points to 'the legislature,' saying they are the same. What is the precise error?

(A) There is no error, because the union tier and the legislature are two names for the same body

(B) The error is that the legislature is a role, not an organ, so it cannot be a tier either

(C) The union tier is a level of government (union/state/local), while the legislature is an organ (legislature/executive/judiciary); the student confused a tier with an organ

(D) The error is that the union tier is one of the four parts of a state, not a level of government

25. A neighbourhood drain is cleared after the local municipal body decides, without waiting for the union government, while national defence stays with the centre and school policy with the state. Which statement best captures BOTH decentralisation and federalism at work here?

(A) Federalism shares power among union, state and local governments, and decentralisation lets the level closest to the matter decide it, so defence stays central while the drain is settled locally

(B) This shows centralisation, because the union government ultimately controls every decision including the drain

(C) This shows the abolition of the local tier, since the municipal body acted instead of the union government

(D) This shows foreign control, because handing the drain to a local body is what decentralisation means

26. A pamphlet declares: 'If our party loses the next election, the nation's existing laws will all expire and the country will lose its independence overnight.' How many of these two claims are true, and why?

(A) Both are true: a defeated party carries away both the laws and the country's independence

(B) Only the loss of laws is true, since a new party means a fresh legal code from day one

(C) Neither is true: existing laws stay in force until they are changed, and independence (sovereignty) belongs to the enduring state, not to any party

(D) Only the loss of independence is true, since sovereignty changes hands with the government

27. A civics exam asks: 'Within a state, WHO performs the work of making, enforcing and interpreting laws, and which parts of the state do NOT do this work?' Which answer is fully correct?

- (A) The population does it directly, personally drafting, policing and judging every law, while the government merely watches
- (B) Sovereignty does it alone, with no organs involved, and the government is simply another name for sovereignty
- (C) The territory does it, because laws apply to the land, while the government only collects taxes
- (D) The government does this work through its three organs; the population, territory and sovereignty are the state's other parts and do not perform this work

28. Four statements about the rule of law are offered. Exactly one is fully correct. Which one?

- (A) Officials must obey the law, but the head of government may write personal exceptions when results demand it
- (B) The law binds ordinary citizens and minorities, while those in power are trusted to police themselves
- (C) Everyone, including ministers, the police and the head of government, must follow the law, and an independent judiciary can hold them to it
- (D) The rule of law mainly means the government can pass any law a majority supports, with no limits

29. A country has: a freely elected parliament; an elected (non-hereditary) president; courts that can strike down unconstitutional laws; minority rights protected against majority votes; and power shared between a centre and regional bodies. Which set of labels ALL correctly apply at once?

- (A) Democracy, republic, judicial review present, rule of law above the majority, and a federal sharing of power
- (B) Democracy but not a republic, with the majority free to override rights, under a single central government
- (C) Republic but not a democracy, with courts unable to check laws, under foreign control
- (D) Monarchy with no judicial review, majority rule without limits, and no sharing of power

30. Match each organ to its defining verb and to one example, then pick the row that is entirely correct.

- (A) Legislature — enforces — police carry out a law; Executive — interprets — ministers decide guilt; Judiciary — makes — judges pass new statutes
- (B) Legislature — makes — an elected house votes a bill into law; Executive — enforces — officials implement the law across districts; Judiciary — interprets — a court decides whether someone broke it
- (C) Legislature — interprets — the house decides a law's meaning; Executive — makes — officials draft statutes; Judiciary — enforces — courts arrest offenders
- (D) Legislature — makes — the house votes a bill; Executive — interprets — ministers settle disputes; Judiciary — enforces — courts implement laws

31. A citizen insists, 'The ministers we elect personally process every file, run every office and deliver every service each day.' Which correction is both accurate and explains why the misconception is tempting?

- (A) It is accurate: ministers do every administrative task themselves, which is why governance is so personal
- (B) The courts run the daily administration, so the citizen has merely named the wrong elected body
- (C) The non-elected, exam-selected permanent executive actually runs day-to-day administration whichever party wins; ministers set direction, so it is tempting to credit them with the daily work they only oversee
- (D) The legislature personally manages every office each day, which the citizen mistook for the ministers

32. A pamphlet asserts, 'Whoever commands the police and army is, in truth, the government, since force decides who rules.' After an election the police and army stay in post while a new cabinet takes office. Which response best refutes the pamphlet using this fact?

- (A) The pamphlet is right: because the police and army stayed, they must be the continuing real government
- (B) The police and army are part of the population and have no role in running the state, so the pamphlet asks the wrong question
- (C) The police and army are a foreign power placed over the state, so neither they nor the cabinet truly govern
- (D) The police and army are state machinery that the elected government directs; they stayed while the cabinet changed, proving force does not determine who governs

33. A teacher writes four phrases: 'makes the laws,' 'enforces the laws,' 'interprets the laws and settles disputes,' and 'is chosen by the people in elections.' She asks which one does NOT name the law-related function of an organ. Which is the odd one out, and why?

- (A) 'Makes the laws' is the odd one out, because making law is a power of the people, not of an organ
- (B) 'Enforces the laws' is the odd one out, because enforcement belongs to the police, not to an organ
- (C) 'Interprets the laws and settles disputes' is the odd one out, because interpretation is done by citizens, not an organ
- (D) 'Is chosen by the people in elections' is the odd one out, because it describes how a government is selected, not the law-related function of any single organ

34. Country X loses a war: its land is annexed, its people now live under a neighbour's laws, and it can no longer make or enforce any law of its own. Of all the features sometimes attributed to a state, which loss is the one that actually ends X's existence as a state?

- (A) The loss of its national flag, which every state must legally possess to exist
- (B) The loss of an independent judiciary, since the judiciary is one of the four parts of a state
- (C) The loss of sovereignty — its power to make and enforce its own laws free of outside control
- (D) The loss of a standing army, without which no state can exist

35. Three claims are made about the armed forces: (1) the army is the fourth part of a state alongside population, territory and sovereignty; (2) whoever commands the army is by definition the government; (3) the army is state machinery the government directs. Which is correct, and what error do the other two share?

- (A) Claim 1 is correct; the army is genuinely the fourth part of a state, replacing sovereignty
- (B) Claim 2 is correct; the commander of the army is by definition the country's government
- (C) Claim 3 is correct; claims 1 and 2 both mistake state machinery for either a part of the state or the government itself
- (D) All three are correct, since the army is at once a part, the government, and machinery

36. A speaker says, 'Democracy means the majority decides, so if 51% vote for it, any law at all must take effect — there can be no higher block.' Which objection is grounded in this chapter AND identifies the body that can enforce the block?

- (A) There is no objection: in a democracy 51% can pass absolutely any law, and no body may block it
- (B) Guaranteed rights and the rule of law set limits a majority cannot cross, and an independent judiciary can strike down a law that violates those rights even with majority support

(C) The objection is that only minorities, never majorities, may decide laws, which the courts enforce

(D) The objection is that democracies have no laws at all, so nothing can be passed or blocked

37. A diagram nests three layers: an outer ring 'national defence and foreign policy,' a middle ring 'school and health policy,' and an inner dot 'clearing a neighbourhood drain.' Each layer is decided at a different level of government. Which mapping reflects federalism and decentralisation correctly?

(A) Defence and foreign policy at the union level, school and health policy at the state level, the drain at the local level — power shared across tiers with each matter decided at its closest level

(B) The drain at the union level, defence at the local level, and school policy at a foreign level, since power is shared randomly

(C) All three at the union level, because federalism means the centre decides everything for efficiency

(D) All three at the local level, because decentralisation means every matter is decided locally

38. A student summarises: 'The state is one of the four parts of the government, which endures, while the government has population, territory and sovereignty and changes at elections.' Identify the precise nature of the error.

(A) The only error is the word 'four'; there are actually three parts, but the rest of the sentence is correct

(B) The relationship is reversed: the STATE is the whole made of four parts (one of which is the government), and it is the government, not the state, that changes at elections

(C) There is no error; the government is indeed the enduring whole and the state one of its parts

(D) The error is only that sovereignty, not the government, changes at elections, while the rest holds

39. A losing party demands that, having won the previous election, it should appoint loyal judges, replace all civil servants, and command the courts to uphold its struck-down law. Which single principle, applied consistently, blocks ALL THREE demands at once?

(A) Sovereignty, because a sovereign state's ruling party may freely appoint judges and officials and direct the courts

(B) Decentralisation, because spreading power means the party can place its loyalists at every level

(C) The provider role, because a government that supplies services has earned the right to control the courts and service

(D) Judicial independence together with the permanent, neutral service: courts and the bureaucracy serve the state under the rule of law, not a party, so they cannot be packed, purged, or commanded to favour one side

40. A country abolishes its hereditary monarch, now elects its head of state, but allows only one approved party to contest and bars all real choice; meanwhile a neighbouring kingdom keeps a hereditary monarch yet holds genuinely free multiparty elections for its parliament. Classify each correctly.

(A) The first is both a democracy and a republic; the second is neither

(B) Both are democracies and republics, since each holds elections of some kind

(C) The first is a republic but not a democracy; the second is a democracy but not a republic

(D) The first is a democracy but not a republic; the second is a republic but not a democracy

41. A minister, facing a court ruling against him, declares, 'I am part of the government, which makes the laws, so the rule of law does not bind me.' Two separate mistakes are packed into this sentence. What are they?

(A) First, the rule of law binds only citizens, so he is right there; second, he correctly notes the executive makes laws

(B) His only mistake is claiming exemption; he is right that the executive makes the laws

(C) His only mistake is the law-making claim; he is right that ministers are exempt from the rule of law

(D) First, the rule of law binds everyone including ministers; second, the executive (where ministers sit) enforces laws, while the legislature makes them, so he has also misassigned law-making

42. A government inspects food shops for hygiene, opens a public hospital, and sends the army to repel a border raid, all in the same week. A student labels all three 'the regulator role, because the government is acting.' Why is this wrong, and what is the correct breakdown?

(A) Acting is not the same as regulating: inspecting shops is the regulator role, opening a hospital is the provider role, and repelling a border raid is the protector role

(B) It is correct: any government action is regulation, so all three are the regulator role

(C) Opening the hospital and repelling the raid are also regulation, because both involve enforcing standards

(D) All three are the protector role, because each ultimately keeps citizens safe in some way

43. A free press exposes wasted public funds; citizens organise and demand answers; an RTI reply confirms the waste; and the issue forces a minister to resign before any election. A commentator says, 'Since no election occurred, the government was not held accountable.' Why is the commentator wrong?

- (A) The commentator is right: accountability happens only at elections, so nothing here counted
- (B) The commentator is right: only the courts can hold a government accountable, and no court acted
- (C) Accountability requires sovereignty, and since no foreign power was involved, none occurred
- (D) Accountability works through many tools, not only elections — a free media, civil society and RTI together held the government answerable and forced consequences between elections

44. A teacher asks students to place 'judicial review' in the correct family. Four students answer. Which placement is correct?

- (A) It is one of the four parts of a state, alongside population, territory and sovereignty
- (B) It is one of the government's three roles, alongside protector, provider and regulator
- (C) It is a power of the judiciary, the organ that interprets laws, used to strike down laws or actions that breach the Constitution
- (D) It is a tier of government, sitting between the union and the state tiers

45. A speaker says, 'Because we are a democracy and an independent judiciary checks the government, the judiciary must be more powerful than the people who elected the government.' Why does this misread the chapter?

- (A) The speaker is right: an independent judiciary is the supreme power and may overrule the people whenever it wishes
- (B) The speaker is wrong because the judiciary actually has no power to check the elected government at all
- (C) The speaker is wrong because the elected government is above the Constitution, so no court can check it
- (D) Judicial independence means courts can check the government against the Constitution, but courts too are bound by the rule of law and the Constitution the people gave themselves; it is the Constitution, not the judges, that stands above the government

46. A government does the following in one budget: funds new schools and clinics; deploys coast guards; runs a consumer-safety agency that fines fraudulent traders; holds a general election; and shares tax revenue with state and local bodies. Which classification of these five items is exactly correct?

(A) All five are the three roles, since holding an election is the regulator role and revenue-sharing is the provider role

(B) Schools/clinics = provider; coast guards = protector; the safety agency = regulator; the election is how the government is chosen, not a role; revenue-sharing reflects federalism, not a role

(C) Schools, the election and revenue-sharing are all provider; coast guards and the safety agency are both protector

(D) Coast guards and the safety agency are both regulator; schools, the election and revenue-sharing are all provider

47. A student argues, 'Sovereignty and democracy are the same thing, because both are about a country governing itself.' Which scenario most clearly shows they are different?

(A) A democracy that must obey a foreign capital's orders shows the two always go together

(B) A sovereign country ruled by an unelected dictator makes and enforces its own laws with no outside control yet is not a democracy, so sovereignty can exist without democracy

(C) A country with no population but full borders shows sovereignty and democracy are identical

(D) A country that holds free elections automatically gains sovereignty, proving the two are the same

48. In a federal country, the union handles defence, states handle police and health, and local bodies handle drains and street lighting. A union minister orders a town to redesign its street lighting his way, bypassing the local body. Which chapter idea best identifies what has gone wrong?

(A) It violates decentralisation and the federal sharing of power, because a purely local matter should be decided at the local level, not dictated from the centre

(B) Nothing is wrong, because federalism means the union government may decide every matter at every level

(C) It violates sovereignty, because the town's lighting is part of the country's power to make its own laws

(D) It violates the rule of law, because deciding lighting is a judicial function the minister usurped

49. A pamphlet says, 'The Constitution is just words; real power lies with whoever controls the police and the courts, so capture them and you rule.' Which combination of chapter ideas best rebuts this?

- (A) The rule of law binds even rulers to the Constitution, the judiciary is meant to be independent of the ruling party, and the police are state machinery serving the state — so capturing them would breach the very order that makes lawful rule possible
- (B) The pamphlet is right, because sovereignty means whoever holds force may rewrite the Constitution at will
- (C) The pamphlet is right, because in a democracy the majority controls the courts and police anyway
- (D) The Constitution prevents this automatically by force, so no rebuttal from principles is needed

50. A government holds free elections, courts strike down unconstitutional laws, and the bureaucracy stays neutral across changes of party — but a foreign power must approve its annual laws. Which single label does NOT correctly describe this country?

- (A) A democracy — because its people freely choose the government in elections
- (B) Fully sovereign — because an outside power must approve its laws, it lacks full sovereignty
- (C) A state with judicial review — because its courts can strike down unconstitutional laws
- (D) A state with a neutral permanent executive — because its bureaucracy stays across party changes

51. A student maps the chapter as a single sentence and must choose the only fully correct version. Which is it?

- (A) The government endures with four parts, while the state changes at every election under the majority's unlimited will
- (B) The state endures with its four parts, while the government — one part, working through three organs, playing three roles, across three tiers — changes at elections, all under the rule of law
- (C) The state and the government are identical, both governed solely by whatever the majority decides
- (D) The three tiers (union, state, local) are simply the same as the three organs (legislature, executive, judiciary)

52. A teacher asks: 'Which one statement, if true, would by itself prove a country is NOT a full state right now?' Pick the statement that does this.

- (A) 'Its ruling party recently changed after an election' — this alone proves it is not a state
- (B) 'Every law it passes can be vetoed by a foreign power' — this alone removes sovereignty, so it cannot be a full state
- (C) 'It has no national anthem' — this alone proves it is not a state
- (D) 'Its courts once struck down a law' — this alone proves it is not a state

53. A government program assigns: writing the country's laws to one body, carrying them out to a second, and resolving disputes about them to a third — but a memo accidentally tells the dispute-resolving body to also write the laws. Which chapter idea explains why this memo is dangerous?

- (A) It is fine, because the judiciary's main job is to write laws anyway
- (B) It is dangerous only because the executive was left out, not because any organ overlaps
- (C) It is dangerous because the legislature would lose its role of enforcing laws
- (D) It collapses the separation of the law-making organ from the law-interpreting organ, undermining the judiciary's role as an independent check; the body that judges laws should not also write them

54. A reformer wants to test whether a country truly follows the rule of law. Which single observation would most strongly confirm it does?

- (A) The ruling party wins every election by a large margin, showing strong public support
- (B) The army is large and well-equipped, deterring any challenge to the government
- (C) A powerful minister who broke the law is tried and punished by an independent court just as an ordinary citizen would be
- (D) The government quickly passes whatever laws the majority demands without delay

55. A citizen says, 'I can hold the government accountable in four ways: file an RTI, report wrongdoing to a free press, organise with others in civil society, and vote at the next election.' A friend adds a fifth 'way': 'and command the army to remove the ministers.' Which response is correct?

- (A) All five are valid, because using the army to remove a bad government is the ultimate accountability
- (B) Only voting is genuine; RTI, the press and civil society are not real accountability tools
- (C) None of the five is accountability; accountability happens only through the courts
- (D) The first four are genuine, lawful accountability tools, but commanding the army to remove ministers is not — it is force, which would itself break the rule of law

56. A country has free elections (democracy), an elected president (republic), strong judicial review, and protected minority rights, yet a recent law lets the majority party jail journalists who criticise it. Which chapter idea most precisely identifies what this law endangers, and what should check it?

- (A) It endangers accountability and the rule of law by silencing the free media; an independent judiciary using judicial review should strike it down for breaching protected rights
- (B) It endangers sovereignty, and a foreign court should overturn it

(C) It endangers federalism, and the local tier should refuse to enforce it

(D) Nothing is endangered, because a democratic majority may pass any law it wishes

57. A teacher draws three columns headed 'four parts of a state,' 'three organs,' and 'three roles,' then hands out cards reading: sovereignty, judiciary, regulator, population, executive, protector, territory, legislature, provider, government. Which placement of ALL cards is fully correct?

(A) Parts: population, territory, government, sovereignty; organs: legislature, executive, judiciary; roles: protector, provider, regulator

(B) Parts: population, territory, legislature, sovereignty; organs: government, executive, judiciary; roles: protector, provider, regulator

(C) Parts: population, territory, government, regulator; organs: legislature, executive, judiciary; roles: protector, provider, sovereignty

(D) Parts: population, government, protector, sovereignty; organs: legislature, territory, judiciary; roles: executive, provider, regulator

58. A student says, 'After an election, the only things that stay exactly the same are the territory and the population; everything else — government, sovereignty, laws, bureaucracy — is replaced.' How many of the four listed as 'replaced' are actually replaced?

(A) All four are replaced, exactly as the student says

(B) Two are replaced: the government and its sovereignty change, while the laws and bureaucracy continue

(C) Only one: the government (the political executive) is replaced, while sovereignty, the laws, and the bureaucracy all continue

(D) Three are replaced: the government, the laws and the bureaucracy change, while only sovereignty continues

59. A country is debating reforms. Proposal 1: let the elected majority appoint and dismiss judges at will. Proposal 2: let ministers personally hire and fire civil servants by loyalty. Proposal 3: bar the press from reporting on the government. Which chapter principles, taken together, identify what all three proposals would erode?

(A) They would strengthen democracy, because the elected majority gains more control over every institution

(B) They would erode only sovereignty, since controlling courts, staff and press concerns outside powers

(C) They would erode judicial independence, the neutral permanent executive, and accountability through a free media — together weakening the rule of law that limits power

(D) They are unrelated to any chapter principle, since each concerns a different organ

60. A final integrative claim reads: 'In India the majority's elected government may do whatever it wishes, because as a sovereign democratic republic the people's will is unlimited.' Identify every flaw in this single sentence.

(A) Two flaws: the rule of law and guaranteed rights limit even an elected government, so its will is not unlimited; and 'sovereign,' 'democratic' and 'republic' describe different things (external freedom, who rules, an elected head), not a licence for unlimited power

(B) No flaw: as a sovereign democratic republic, the elected majority's will is indeed unlimited

(C) One flaw only: the country is not actually a republic, but the unlimited-will claim is correct

(D) One flaw only: the unlimited-will claim is correct, but the country is not actually sovereign

Worked Solutions

1. (B) A full state needs population, territory, government AND sovereignty; sovereignty is the FINAL power to make and enforce its own laws with no outside control. Here an outside power must approve every law, so the final say is not the island's — sovereignty is incomplete, which is the flaw. The 'cabinet supplies sovereignty' option is wrong because a functioning government is a separate part and does not by itself grant the freedom from outside control that sovereignty requires. The 'missing territory' option is wrong because the borders are marked and recognised; a neighbour's approval power concerns law-making, not the land. The 'missing government' option is wrong because a cabinet running daily affairs IS a government; its problem is the absence of independent final authority, which is a sovereignty defect, not a government defect.

2. (D) The four parts of a state are population, territory, government and sovereignty — but the list offers no item literally called 'government,' so only population, territory and sovereignty survive: three items. The 'executive' is an ORGAN of government, not a part of a state, so the four-with-executive option is wrong. 'Judicial review' is a POWER of the judiciary, not a part, so that option is wrong. The 'regulator role' is one of the government's three roles and the 'local tier' is one of the three tiers, so the five-item option wrongly counts a role and a tier as parts.

3. (B) The enduring state (population, territory, sovereignty) persists across all three governments, so the country can be far older than any single term — error one is dating the state by a government's term. The growing archive shows old laws stay in force until changed, so laws do NOT reset — error two is the 'laws expire' claim. The option that accepts the one-term dating keeps error one. The option that says the state resets repeats the state/government confusion. The 'both correct' option endorses both errors at once.

4. (D) In the analogy the school is the enduring institution = the STATE, and the teachers who come and go = the GOVERNMENT. The student swapped the labels, so the supposed 'lasting' thing (teachers/government) is actually the changing one, while the 'scattering' thing (school/state) is actually what endures — the consequence is exactly backwards. The option calling the swapped labels 'correct' keeps the error. The 'schools cannot be demolished' option misses that the fault is the label reversal, not the physical premise. The 'nothing endures' option contradicts the analogy's whole point, which is precisely that the state endures.

5. (D) Sovereignty is the final power to make and enforce one's own laws free of outside control. M keeps the final say despite a treaty, and P has no outside control at all, so BOTH are fully sovereign; N must obey a foreign capital, so it alone lacks sovereignty. The step-down option wrongly assumes any treaty erodes sovereignty — voluntary coordination that preserves the final say does not. The 'N most sovereign' option mistakes obedience to orders for self-rule, which is the opposite of sovereignty. The 'all equal' option ignores that population and territory alone do not settle the question of final law-making control.

6. (A) Sovereignty is the state's final, recognised authority to make and enforce its own laws without outside control. The army is machinery the government directs, so raw strength is an instrument, not the definition — that refutes the debater. The 'commander holds sovereignty' option mistakes machinery for the sovereign authority. The 'no army' option flips the claim into an equally false opposite — sovereignty is not measured by force in either direction. The 'foreign approval' option describes the LOSS of sovereignty, since needing outside approval is exactly what a sovereign state does not require.

7. (C) The political executive (ministers) changing IS the meaningful change, so the election was not meaningless — that defeats the first horn. The permanent machinery (soldiers, police, clerks) serves the enduring state regardless of who wins and is not 'the government' — that defeats the second horn. The 'staff should be replaced' option endorses the first horn and misunderstands the value of a permanent, neutral service. The 'officers are the government' option endorses the second horn by confusing machinery with the elected team. The 'same people' option is factually false: ministers and civil servants are distinct, with one changing and one staying.

8. (D) The large whole containing four parts is the STATE (P). The inner shape split into makes/enforces/interprets is the GOVERNMENT'S three organs (Q). The slot that subdivides into changing ministers and exam-selected officers who stay is the EXECUTIVE, split into political and permanent parts (R). The 'P is government' option reverses the nesting — the state contains the government, not the other way round. The 'sovereignty/territory/population' option mislabels every layer. The 'P is the executive' option places the executive as the whole and invents a 'hereditary' bureaucracy, which does not exist; the permanent executive is exam-selected, not hereditary.

9. (D) Two ideas combine: constitutional rights and the rule of law cap what any majority may do, and an independent judiciary using judicial review can strike down a rights-violating measure even when it is popular. That is why the vote is not final. The 'decentralisation/federalism' option misframes the issue as a centre-versus-local hierarchy, but the court acted on rights, not on who outranks whom. The 'roles' option mislabels a discriminatory fee as ordinary service provision. The 'sovereignty' option confuses the state's external freedom to make laws with the INTERNAL limit that rights impose — sovereignty does not license trampling protected rights.

10. (B) Two principles are needed because the leader makes two errors. First, guaranteed rights plus the rule of law cap what any majority — even 70% — may do, so the worship ban is invalid. Second, the rule of law binds everyone INCLUDING the leader and officials, so the self-exemption is also invalid. The 'majority may pass any law' option concedes the first error. The 'only minorities decide' option invents minority rule, which the chapter never claims. The 'no limiting laws' option denies the rule of law that the question depends on, leaving the majority unchecked.

11. (B) 'Matsya nyaya', the law of the fishes, is the condition where the powerful prey on the weak when law and order vanish — exactly the district described — and it shows government under the rule of law exists to maintain order and protect the weak. The 'everyone equal' option inverts the meaning, since matsya nyaya is disorder, not equality. The 'weak overpower the strong' option reverses who dominates. The 'fish make laws' option takes the phrase literally and misses the point entirely.

12. (A) Overriding courts and silencing critics removes the checks that bind the powerful (the rule of law) and so invites matsya nyaya, where the strong prey on the weak — that links the two ideas. The 'no danger' option redefines the rule of law as a leader's will, which is its opposite. The 'crime might not fall' option treats the harm as merely practical and misses the principled breach. The 'courts make laws' option misstates the consequence — silencing courts does not turn them into legislatures; it removes the check on the executive.

13. (C) Debating and voting a bill is the LEGISLATURE making law. Exam-selected officials issuing instructions to implement it is the PERMANENT EXECUTIVE (bureaucracy) enforcing. A court deciding whether the driver broke the law is the JUDICIARY interpreting/applying. A court striking down an unconstitutional clause is again the JUDICIARY, this time through judicial review. The first wrong option lets the legislature 'strike' a law, but striking down is judicial review, not legislation. The second wrong option makes the political executive apply the law in court, but courts, not ministers, decide guilt. The third wrong option has courts making laws and the executive cancelling them, scrambling every role.

14. (C) The permanent executive serves the enduring state, not the ruling party, so it stays on across elections; sacking it each time would destroy the steady, experienced administration that keeps the state running whoever wins — that justifies her refusal and names the loss. The 'should resign' option treats the neutral service as party staff. The 'outranks the minister' option invents a false hierarchy and denies any cost. The 'makes the laws' option misassigns law-making (a legislative function) to a civil servant, who actually implements laws.

15. (A) Democracy concerns whether the people freely choose the government; republic concerns whether the head of state is elected rather than hereditary — two independent axes. G elects everyone freely: democracy + republic. H elects lawmakers freely but has a hereditary monarch: democracy, not republic (like the UK). J has an elected (non-hereditary) head but no free choice: republic, not democracy. The 'all three' option ignores that H's monarch blocks republic and J's single party blocks democracy. The second wrong option swaps H and J's labels. The 'none is a republic' option wrongly fuses the two axes by demanding free elections for republic status, but republic is only about the head of state being elected, not hereditary.

16. (B) To break 'always together,' one needs a case where one label holds without the other. A democracy with a hereditary monarch is a democracy but NOT a republic, so the two have come apart — that disproves the claim. The military dictatorship is neither, so it does not show one without the other. The fully elected country is both, which is consistent with 'together' and proves nothing. The hereditary king who blocks elections is neither, so again it shows no split. Only the democracy-without-republic case forces the two axes apart.

17. (D) Whether a country is a democracy depends on the people freely choosing the government, which Spain does; the monarch only affects the republic axis, making Spain a democracy but not a republic. The 'right' option falsely treats a monarch as blocking elections — many monarchies hold free elections. The 'republic not democracy' option wrongly calls a hereditary king 'elected,' which contradicts the very definition of republic. The 'neither' option mistakenly treats merely having a head of state as disqualifying, but every country has a head of state.

18. (C) Two ideas combine: an independent judiciary is free of the ruling party's control, and the rule of law binds even the elected government to the Constitution, so striking down an unconstitutional law upholds the rule of law — it is not anti-democratic. The 'decentralisation/federalism' option misreads the issue as a centre-versus-local hierarchy and wrongly subordinates courts. The 'roles' option treats service provision as a reason for courts to defer, which has nothing to do with constitutionality. The 'sovereignty/territory' option confuses the state's external law-making freedom with the internal duty of courts to test laws against the Constitution.

19. (B) Judicial review means courts test laws against the Constitution and strike down those that violate it; because even an elected government is bound by the Constitution, this protects rights and upholds the rule of law — healthy for democracy. The 'never reviewed' option would place the government above the Constitution, defeating the rule of law. The 'actions never laws' option wrongly narrows judicial review, which expressly covers laws. The 'only if the party lost' option invents a partisan trigger; judicial review depends on constitutionality, not on who currently holds office.

20. (A) The three roles are protector (guards/safety), provider (library/meals), and regulator (fair club rules). Being chosen by a periodic vote is not a role at all — it mirrors how a government is selected through elections. Running the library is the PROVIDER role, not a description of being elected. Posting guards is the PROTECTOR role, not bureaucratic implementation. Setting and enforcing club rules is the REGULATOR role, not judicial interpretation. Only the periodic-vote item falls outside the three roles.

21. (A) Defending the coast is PROTECTOR; clinics and the meal scheme are PROVIDER; inspecting prices and fining the unsafe factory are REGULATOR (setting and enforcing fair rules). So protector = 1, provider = 2, regulator = 2, with coast defence the only protector — the correct statement. The 'all regulator' option wrongly folds defence and service-supply into rule-enforcement. The 'four provider' option miscounts inspections and fines as services rather than regulation. The 'fine is protector' option confuses enforcing market rules (regulator) with defending against external attack (protector).

22. (B) Judicial review is specifically a court striking down laws or actions that breach the Constitution — none of these four steps is that. RTI (transparency), free media, public pressure and voting are tools of ACCOUNTABILITY that hold the government answerable, which is the correct umbrella. The 'label is right' option mislabels citizen tools as court powers. The 'only voting' option arbitrarily splits the same accountability family and miscalls the rest judicial review. The 'sovereignty' option confuses citizens checking their government with the state's external power to make laws.

23. (A) Restoring a wrongly stopped pension through a complaints channel is GRIEVANCE REDRESSAL — citizens raising and fixing problems with services, a form of accountability. Judicial review, by contrast, is a court striking down unconstitutional laws or actions; no law was struck down here. The 'judicial review' option conflates fixing a service error with a court invalidating a law. The 'sovereignty' option confuses an administrative correction with the state's external law-making freedom. The 'decentralisation' option wrongly treats a service fix as a transfer of power between tiers.

24. (C) Tiers are LEVELS (union, state, local); organs are FUNCTIONAL branches (legislature, executive, judiciary); the student equated a level with a branch — that is the error. The 'no error' option denies the distinction the chapter draws. The 'legislature is a role' option misclassifies the legislature, which is an organ, not a role (roles are protector/provider/regulator). The 'union tier is a part of a state' option misplaces the tier among the four parts (population/territory/government/sovereignty), which it is not.

25. (A) Federalism is the sharing of power between the centre and state/local governments; decentralisation places decisions at the level closest to the matter — so defence stays central while a purely local drain is decided locally. That captures both. The 'centralisation' option contradicts the scenario, where the local body decided without the centre. The 'abolition of the local tier' option is backwards: the local tier was used, not removed. The 'foreign control' option misdefines decentralisation, which spreads power within the country, never to a foreign power.

26. (C) Existing laws continue until amended or repealed, so they do not expire when a party loses — claim one is false. Sovereignty (independence) belongs to the enduring state, not to any party or government, so it does not vanish — claim two is false. The 'both true' option ties laws and sovereignty to a party, which the chapter denies. The 'only laws' option imagines a legal reset that never occurs. The 'only independence' option wrongly attaches sovereignty to the changing government rather than the lasting state.

27. (D) Making, enforcing and interpreting laws is the GOVERNMENT'S work through its three organs (legislature, executive, judiciary); population, territory and sovereignty are the state's other three parts and do not carry out these functions. The 'population directly' option imagines citizens personally legislating, policing and judging, which the organs actually do. The 'sovereignty alone' option treats a part as an actor and equates it with the government, conflating two distinct things. The 'territory does it' option absurdly makes the land legislate and misdescribes the government as a mere tax collector.

28. (C) The rule of law means no one is above the law — ministers, police and the head of government are all bound, and an independent judiciary enforces this. The 'personal exceptions' option places the head of government above the law, which the rule of law forbids. The 'self-policing' option exempts the powerful, again contradicting the principle. The fourth option confuses the rule of law with majority rule and ignores the limits that rights and the Constitution impose on any majority.

29. (A) Free elections make it a democracy; an elected head of state makes it a republic; courts striking down laws is judicial review; protected minority rights show the rule of law above the majority; centre-plus-regional power-sharing is federalism — all five labels fit. The 'not a republic' option is wrong because the head of state is elected, and it falsely lets the majority override rights. The 'not a democracy' option contradicts the free elections and denies the courts' power. The 'monarchy' option contradicts the elected president and every other feature listed.

30. (B) The legislature MAKES law (voting a bill in); the executive ENFORCES it (officials implementing across districts); the judiciary INTERPRETS it (a court deciding guilt) — the correct row. The first wrong row swaps all three verbs (legislature enforcing, executive interpreting, judiciary making). The second wrong row also scrambles them (legislature interpreting, executive making, judiciary enforcing). The third wrong row keeps the legislature right but swaps the executive's verb to interpret and the judiciary's to enforce, which reverses their true functions.

31. (C) Ministers (political executive) set direction, but the permanent executive — the exam-selected bureaucracy — actually carries out daily administration regardless of which party wins; the misconception is tempting because ministers are the visible face who oversee that work. The 'it is accurate' option ignores the entire permanent service. The 'courts run administration' option misassigns executive work to the judiciary. The 'legislature manages offices' option misassigns it to the law-making organ; neither courts nor the legislature run daily administration.

32. (D) The police and army are state machinery directed by the elected government; their staying put while the cabinet changed shows the elected team — not the force-holders — governs, refuting the pamphlet. The 'pamphlet is right' option treats permanence as proof of governing power, but permanence marks state machinery, not the government. The 'part of the population' option wrongly denies the security forces any state role. The 'foreign power' option invents an outside controller with no basis in the scenario.

33. (D) Making, enforcing and interpreting are the three organs' functions (legislature, executive, judiciary). 'Is chosen by the people in elections' describes how a government is SELECTED, not an organ's law-related function — it is the odd one out. 'Makes the laws' is the legislature's function, not the people's, so it belongs. 'Enforces the laws' is the executive's function; the police are part of that executive machinery, so it belongs. 'Interprets the laws' is the judiciary's function, not citizens', so it belongs too.

34. (C) A state is defined by population, territory, government and sovereignty; once X can no longer make or enforce its own laws, sovereignty is gone and it ceases to be a state — that loss is decisive. The 'flag' option invents a legal requirement; a flag is a symbol, not one of the four parts. The 'independent judiciary' option miscounts an organ as one of the four parts. The 'standing army' option treats military force as a defining part, but the army is machinery, not one of the four parts.

35. (C) The army is state machinery that the elected government directs — claim 3 is correct. Claim 1 wrongly elevates machinery to a PART of the state (the four parts are population, territory, government, sovereignty). Claim 2 wrongly identifies machinery (or its commander) AS the government. So the shared error of 1 and 2 is mistaking machinery for either a part or the government. The 'all three' option cannot stand, since a thing cannot simultaneously be a part, the government, and mere machinery.

36. (B) Rights and the rule of law cap what any majority may do, and an independent judiciary can strike down a rights-violating law through judicial review even if 51% support it — that both objects and names the enforcer. The 'no objection' option leaves the majority unlimited, denying the rule of law. The 'only minorities decide' option invents minority rule the chapter never claims. The 'no laws at all' option is plainly false and removes the very framework the question relies on.

37. (A) Federalism shares power across union, state and local tiers, and decentralisation assigns each matter to its closest level: national defence to the union, broad policy to the state, and a purely local drain to the local body — the correct mapping. The 'random' option scrambles levels and invents a foreign level. The 'all union' option describes centralisation, the opposite of decentralisation. The 'all local' option overstates decentralisation, since national defence cannot sensibly be decided drain-by-drain at the local level.

38. (B) The sentence inverts the whole/part relationship: the STATE is the whole of four parts — population, territory, government, sovereignty — and the GOVERNMENT is one part that changes at elections, while the state endures. So the error is the full reversal of which is the whole and which changes. The 'word four' option treats the count as the only mistake, ignoring the inversion. The 'no error' option endorses the reversal. The 'sovereignty changes' option keeps the inversion and misattributes change to sovereignty, which actually belongs to the enduring state.

39. (D) An independent judiciary and a neutral permanent service both answer to the state and the rule of law, not to a party — so judges cannot be packed, civil servants cannot be purged for loyalty, and courts cannot be ordered to uphold an unconstitutional law. That one principle blocks all three demands. The 'sovereignty' option misreads the state's external law-making freedom as a licence to capture institutions internally. The 'decentralisation' option misframes spreading power as spreading patronage. The 'provider role' option absurdly treats service delivery as earning control over independent institutions.

40. (C) Republic depends only on an elected (non-hereditary) head of state; democracy depends on the people freely choosing the government. The first elects its head (republic) but bars real choice (not a democracy). The second keeps a hereditary monarch (not a republic) but holds free elections (a democracy). The 'both/neither' option ignores the single-party block and the monarch. The 'both are both' option overlooks that one bars choice and the other keeps a monarch. The last option swaps the two classifications.

41. (D) Two errors: (1) the rule of law binds everyone, so a minister is not exempt; (2) ministers belong to the EXECUTIVE, which enforces laws, while the LEGISLATURE makes them, so he wrongly claims his branch makes the laws. The first wrong option accepts both mistaken premises. The 'only exemption' option overlooks the misassignment of law-making. The 'only law-making' option overlooks that no one is above the rule of law; both errors are present, not one.

42. (A) The regulator role specifically means SETTING AND ENFORCING FAIR RULES (the hygiene inspection); opening a hospital is the PROVIDER role (supplying a service); repelling a raid is the PROTECTOR role (defending the country). 'The government is acting' does not make every act regulation. The 'all regulation' option mistakes mere activity for rule-enforcement. The 'hospital and raid are regulation' option misclassifies provision and defence. The 'all protector' option stretches 'keeping people safe' to absorb provision and regulation, erasing the distinctions.

43. (D) Accountability runs through a free media, civil society, RTI and voting — voting is just one channel. Here the press, citizens and RTI together forced a resignation between elections, so the government WAS held accountable. The 'only at elections' option wrongly narrows accountability to voting. The 'only courts' option confuses accountability with judicial review. The 'requires sovereignty' option misapplies an external concept; accountability is about citizens checking their own government, not about foreign powers.

44. (C) Judicial review is a POWER of the judiciary (the interpreting organ) to strike down unconstitutional laws and actions — that is its correct family. It is not one of the four PARTS of a state (population, territory, government, sovereignty). It is not one of the three ROLES (protector, provider, regulator). It is not a TIER (union, state, local). Each distractor misfiles a court power into the wrong category of the chapter's framework.

45. (D) Judicial independence lets courts check the government against the Constitution, but the courts themselves are bound by that Constitution and the rule of law — it is the Constitution, the people's framework, that limits the government, not the judges' personal supremacy. The 'judiciary is supreme' option wrongly makes judges unaccountable rulers. The 'no power to check' option denies judicial review entirely. The 'government above the Constitution' option destroys the rule of law that the whole arrangement rests on.

46. (B) Provider = schools and clinics (supplying services); protector = coast guards (defence); regulator = the consumer-safety agency (setting and enforcing fair rules). The election is how a government is SELECTED, not a role, and revenue-sharing reflects FEDERALISM, not a role. The first wrong option forces the election and revenue-sharing into roles they do not belong to. The second misclassifies the election and revenue-sharing as provider. The third wrongly calls coast-guard defence 'regulator' and again misfiles the election and revenue-sharing.

47. (B) Sovereignty is the final power to make and enforce one's own laws free of outside control; democracy is the people freely choosing the government — different ideas. A sovereign dictatorship has the former without the latter, cleanly separating them. The 'democracy obeying a foreign capital' option is incoherent, since obeying foreign orders means it lacks sovereignty, not that the two coincide. The 'no population' option describes something that is not a state at all. The 'elections grant sovereignty' option wrongly fuses the two, but elections concern democracy, not freedom from outside control.

48. (A) Decentralisation places local matters with the local level, and federalism shares power across tiers; a union minister dictating street lighting bypasses the local body and breaches both — that is the wrong. The 'nothing wrong' option misdefines federalism as total central control, its opposite. The 'sovereignty' option misapplies an external concept to an internal tier dispute. The 'rule of law/judicial function' option wrongly calls lighting a judicial matter; the issue is which TIER decides, not which organ.

49. (A) Three ideas rebut the pamphlet: the rule of law binds even rulers to the Constitution; an independent judiciary is not the ruling party's tool; and the police are state machinery serving the state, not personal muscle — so 'capturing' them would itself violate the lawful order. The 'sovereignty' option misreads external freedom as a licence to overturn the Constitution. The 'majority controls courts and police' option denies judicial independence and the neutral service. The 'Constitution prevents this by force' option misunderstands how principles, not automatic force, sustain lawful rule.

50. (B) Free elections make it a democracy; courts striking down laws show judicial review; a neutral bureaucracy across changes is a permanent executive — all three labels FIT. But because a foreign power must approve its annual laws, it is NOT fully sovereign, since sovereignty requires freedom from outside control over its laws. So 'fully sovereign' is the label that does not apply. The other three are all accurately described by the scenario.

51. (B) The correct synthesis: the STATE (four parts) endures; the GOVERNMENT (one part) acts through three organs, plays three roles, operates across three tiers, and changes at elections, all bound by the rule of law. The first wrong option reverses which endures and falsely makes the majority's will unlimited. The 'identical' option erases the state/government distinction and again removes the rule-of-law limit. The 'tiers equal organs' option conflates levels (union/state/local) with branches (legislature/executive/judiciary).

52. (B) A foreign veto over every law removes sovereignty, one of the four parts, so that statement alone disqualifies it as a full state. A change of ruling party is normal — the government changes while the state endures — so it proves nothing. Lacking a national anthem is irrelevant; an anthem is not one of the four parts. A court striking down a law is judicial review functioning correctly and does not threaten statehood. Only the foreign-veto statement attacks a defining part.

53. (D) The chapter assigns making to the legislature, enforcing to the executive, and interpreting to the judiciary; letting the interpreting body also write laws destroys the independent check, since a body cannot impartially judge laws it authored. The 'judiciary writes laws' option misstates the judiciary's role — it interprets, not writes. The 'executive left out' option misidentifies the problem; the danger is the overlap, not an omission. The 'legislature enforces' option misassigns enforcement to the legislature, whose role is making laws.

54. (C) The rule of law means no one is above the law; a powerful minister being tried and punished like anyone else, by an INDEPENDENT court, is the strongest confirmation. Large election margins show popularity, not that the powerful are bound by law. A strong army shows force, not legal accountability. Rapidly passing whatever the majority demands ignores the limits rights and the rule of law place on majorities, so it is no evidence of the rule of law and may even cut against it.

55. (D) RTI, a free press, civil society and voting are all lawful accountability tools that hold a government answerable. Commanding the army to oust ministers is force, not accountability, and would breach the rule of law that the whole system rests on — so the fifth 'way' is invalid. The 'all five valid' option endorses force as accountability. The 'only voting' option wrongly discards the other lawful tools. The 'only courts' option confuses accountability with judicial review and ignores the citizen tools entirely.

56. (A) A free media is a key accountability tool, and jailing critics also breaches protected rights and the rule of law; the proper check is an independent judiciary striking the law down through judicial review. The 'sovereignty/foreign court' option wrongly imports an external power, which would itself violate sovereignty. The 'federalism/local tier' option misframes a rights issue as a tiers dispute and wrongly invites local defiance. The 'nothing endangered' option falsely treats a majority as unlimited, ignoring rights and the rule of law.

57. (A) The four parts are population, territory, government, sovereignty; the three organs are legislature, executive, judiciary; the three roles are protector, provider, regulator — the only fully correct placement. The first wrong option misfiles the legislature (an organ) as a part and the government (a part) as an organ. The second misfiles a regulator (a role) as a part and sovereignty (a part) as a role. The third scatters protector, territory and executive into the wrong columns entirely.

58. (C) At an election the political executive (the government) changes, but sovereignty belongs to the enduring state, existing laws continue until changed, and the permanent bureaucracy stays on — so only ONE of the four listed is actually replaced. The 'all four' option repeats the student's error. The 'two replaced' option wrongly attaches sovereignty to the changing government. The 'three replaced' option wrongly resets the laws and purges the neutral bureaucracy, both of which actually continue.

59. (C) Proposal 1 attacks judicial independence; Proposal 2 attacks the neutral permanent executive; Proposal 3 attacks accountability via a free media — together they erode the rule of law that keeps power in check. The 'strengthen democracy' option mistakes capturing institutions for democracy, ignoring that democracy needs these very checks. The 'only sovereignty' option misapplies an external concept to internal checks.

The 'unrelated' option misses that all three trace to the chapter's interlocking limits on power.

60. (A) The sentence has two flaws. First, the rule of law and constitutional rights limit even an elected government, so the majority's will is NOT unlimited. Second, it muddles three distinct ideas: sovereignty (external freedom from outside control), democracy (the people choosing the government), and republic (an elected, non-hereditary head of state) — none of which grants unlimited power. The 'no flaw' option endorses unlimited majority power. The two 'one flaw' options each accept the false unlimited-will claim while quibbling over a label, missing the central error that rights and the rule of law cap the majority.
