Chapter 17: India, a Home to Many

Paper 4 — (progressively harder)

Subject	Social Science (NCERT Class 7)
Chapter	17 — India, a Home to Many
Total Questions	60 (Multiple Choice, single correct)
Maximum Marks	240
Suggested Time	90 minutes

Marking scheme: +4 for each correct answer · -1 for each wrong answer · 0 if unattempted.

Instructions: Each question has four options (A), (B), (C), (D); exactly one is correct. Classic P4 traps: filing a refuge or enslaved community under 'trade'; fusing Islam's peaceful 7th-century arrival via Arab merchants with the much later military invasions; reading identity-preserving integration as either total assimilation or total apartness; swapping cosmopolitan/pluralism/tolerance/ethos, refuge/persecution, and immigrate/emigrate; treating diversity as a weakness rather than the chapter's source of strength; and confusing prophet (Zarathushtra) with God (Ahura Mazda), or one community's house of worship with another's. Do not write on this paper — mark answers on your answer sheet.

1. A visitor remarks, 'India has only recently started letting outsiders in.' Which fact from the chapter most directly overturns this, and why?

- (A) the Tibetan refugees arrived in the 1950s, showing openness began in the 20th century
- (B) the Baha'is are a modern community, proving India opened only in recent times
- (C) the recognition of the Siddis as a scheduled tribe is recent, so acceptance is recent
- (D) Arab merchants reached the west coast as early as the 7th century, showing India has received newcomers for well over a thousand years

2. 'Atithi devo bhava' and 'vasudhaiva kutumbakam' both express acceptance, but they differ in scope. The best statement of that difference is:

- (A) the first treats the whole world as one family, while the second is only about a single guest
- (B) the first is a rule of trade, while the second is a rule of hospitality

(C) the first is about honouring the individual guest, while the second widens the circle to treat all of humanity as one family

(D) the first applies only in modern times, while the second applied only in ancient times

3. The chapter's repeated phrase that India has long been 'a home to many' is best read as a claim about India's:

(A) record of conquering distant lands and bringing their peoples back

(B) policy of admitting only communities that could pay for trading rights

(C) success in making every newcomer adopt a single Indian identity

(D) ethos of acceptance, which over thousands of years made it home to many communities

4. A debater argues that protecting a nation's culture requires turning newcomers away. The chapter answers this argument most powerfully by pairing which value with which piece of evidence?

(A) vasudhaiva kutumbakam, supported by borrowed foods, words, crafts, music and faiths that made Indian culture richer

(B) tolerance, supported by the Siddhis being kept apart as a separate tribe

(C) atithi devo bhava, supported by newcomers being required to drop their own customs

(D) pluralism, supported by India expelling communities once their use ended

5. Which statement best explains WHY the chapter calls vasudhaiva kutumbakam relevant to today's world, not just to the past?

(A) because it tells modern nations to rule over their neighbours as one family

(B) because it instructs traders alone on how to deal with foreign partners

(C) because it preserves the value as a relic of antiquity with no present use

(D) because peoples of many cultures increasingly live together, and treating the world as one family helps them coexist

6. Two newcomers describe themselves: the first 'left home to escape being attacked for my beliefs'; the second 'came chasing the profits of the spice routes.' In the chapter's framework these motives are, in order:

(A) opportunity, then refuge

(B) persecution, then asylum

(C) conquest, then trade

(D) refuge, then opportunity

7. The chapter's two-path model (refuge or opportunity) does not fit every community. The single clearest exception, and the reason, is:

(A) the Parsis, because they came to conquer rather than to seek refuge or trade

(B) the Siddhis, because they were brought to India enslaved and so chose neither path

(C) the Arab merchants, because they were forced to come against their will

(D) the Tibetans, because they came to rule rather than to take shelter

8. Sort these four by motive: the Polish children, the Armenians, the Cochin Jews, the Mappila's Arab founders. The fully correct sorting is:

- (A) all four came for opportunity through trade
- (B) Polish children and Armenians came for refuge; Cochin Jews and Arab founders came for opportunity
- (C) all four were brought to India enslaved
- (D) Polish children and Cochin Jews came for refuge; Armenians and the Arab founders came for opportunity

9. A refugee and an opportunity-seeking immigrant both settle in India. According to the chapter, the deepest difference between them lies in:

- (A) whether they may keep their traditions, because only the immigrant is allowed to
- (B) whether they ever join Indian society, because only the immigrant truly does
- (C) the degree of choice, because the refugee is driven out by danger or persecution while the immigrant comes freely
- (D) the era they belong to, because refugees are ancient and immigrants are modern

10. Reading the migration vocabulary precisely: a Parsi family that 'left Persia and settled in India' has done what, from each country's viewpoint?

- (A) emigrated from Persia and immigrated into India
- (B) immigrated from Persia and emigrated into India
- (C) only emigrated, since a single move cannot also be an immigration
- (D) neither, because fleeing persecution is not a form of migration

11. Which single pairing of community to its best-fitting motive is correct, where the other three each misfile a community?

- (A) Siddis — opportunity through trade (B) Parsis — opportunity through trade
- (C) Tibetans — refuge from danger (D) Arab merchants — refuge from persecution

12. Among the Parsis, the Siddis and the Armenians, which one fits NEITHER the 'refuge' nor the 'opportunity' path, and what does this reveal?

- (A) the Parsis, revealing that some came purely to rule rather than to settle
- (B) the Armenians, revealing that some came as conquering armies
- (C) none of the three, revealing that every community fits neatly into the two paths
- (D) the Siddis, revealing that not every newcomer came by choice — some were brought enslaved

13. A student claims the synagogue, the fire temple and the church all belong to the same community. The correct correction links each building to its community as:

- (A) synagogue — the Parsis; fire temple — the Jews; church — the Siddis
- (B) synagogue — the Arab merchants; fire temple — the Tibetans; church — the Parsis

(C) synagogue — the Jews; fire temple — the Parsis; church — the Christians (such as the Armenians or Syriac Christians)

(D) synagogue — the Christians; fire temple — the Armenians; church — the Jews

14. The Bene Israel and the Cochin Jews are grouped together in the chapter because both:

(A) are African-origin communities brought to India enslaved

(B) are Jewish communities of India who kept their faith and built synagogues here

(C) are Kerala Muslim communities formed by Arab settlers marrying locally

(D) are Zoroastrian communities that settled in Gujarat with their fire temples

15. That India's Jews maintained synagogues and an unbroken faith for centuries is offered as evidence for which broader claim?

(A) newcomers had to surrender their religion to be accepted in India

(B) newcomers stayed wholly apart and never joined Indian society at all

(C) newcomers eventually came to rule over the older inhabitants of India

(D) newcomers integrated into Indian society while keeping their own identities

16. The Syriac Christians of Kerala are singled out in the chapter chiefly because they show that Christianity in India:

(A) arrived only in the 20th century alongside European rule

(B) was first carried to India by the enslaved Siddis from Africa

(C) is practised only by people of Armenian origin

(D) is very old, one of the world's oldest Christian communities having settled in Kerala long ago

17. What do the Syriac Christians and the Cochin Jews most clearly share, according to the chapter?

(A) both are ancient communities that preserved their own faith while becoming part of Indian society

(B) both were brought to India enslaved and only later set free

(C) both arrived as conquering armies and ruled the regions they entered

(D) both abandoned their original religion soon after settling in India

18. If asked to place the Syriac Christians on the 'refuge vs opportunity' map, the safest reasoning is that, like several other communities, they:

(A) settled in India and preserved their faith, fitting the broader pattern of newcomers who kept their identity

(B) came to conquer Kerala and impose their faith on the locals

(C) gave up their religion on arrival to be allowed to settle

(D) were brought to India enslaved, like the African Siddis

19. A student writes, 'The Parsis worship Zarathushtra as their God.' The precise correction is that:

- (A) Zarathushtra was the prophet who founded the faith, while the one God worshipped is Ahura Mazda
- (B) Zarathushtra is the one God, while Ahura Mazda was merely the prophet
- (C) the Parsis worship many gods of nature, with Zarathushtra chief among them
- (D) Zarathushtra was an Arab merchant who later founded Zoroastrianism in India

20. Which single statement about Zoroastrianism is fully correct?

- (A) it is among the world's newest religions, worshipping many gods of nature
- (B) it is a branch of Judaism centred on the synagogue
- (C) it is a Tibetan healing tradition now part of the AYUSH programme
- (D) it is one of the world's oldest religions, worshipping one God and stressing the choice of good over evil

21. The Parsis settling in Gujarat and keeping their fire temples illustrates which COMBINATION of ideas from the chapter?

- (A) a trading community that came for opportunity and then ruled Gujarat
- (B) an enslaved community later recognised as a scheduled tribe
- (C) a refugee community that integrated into Indian society while preserving its identity
- (D) a modern community that first arrived only in the 20th century

22. Both the Parsis and the Cochin Jews fled persecution, yet the chapter associates each with a different region and marker. The correct pairing is:

- (A) Parsis with Gujarat and their fire temples; Jews with their synagogues
- (B) Parsis with Kerala and their synagogues; Jews with their fire temples
- (C) Parsis with Tibet and their monasteries; Jews with their churches
- (D) Parsis with Armenia and their churches; Jews with their monasteries

23. Why does the chapter use the Parsis as a strong counterexample to 'all communities came to India to trade'?

- (A) because the Parsis came as conquerors who later ruled Gujarat
- (B) because the Parsis were brought to India enslaved against their will
- (C) because the Parsis refused to settle and soon left India again
- (D) because the Parsis came not to trade but to find refuge from religious persecution

24. Comparing the AGE of the faiths tied to India's newcomers, which statement is correct?

- (A) Zoroastrianism is the newest of the world's religions, and Christianity reached Kerala only recently
- (B) Islam reached India's west coast only after the much later military invasions

- (C) all the newcomers' faiths are modern, having arrived only in the 20th century
- (D) Zoroastrianism is one of the world's oldest religions, and the Syriac Christians show Christianity reached Kerala in ancient times

25. A student says, 'Islam came to India entirely through the later military invasions.' The most accurate correction is that Islam:

- (A) never actually reached India until the 20th century
- (B) first reached India peacefully through Arab merchants on the west coast from the 7th century, separately from and earlier than the later invasions
- (C) was first carried into India by the enslaved African Siddis
- (D) arrived only by sea conquest of the west coast

26. India's oldest mosque, built where Arab merchants settled on the west coast, matters in the chapter chiefly as physical evidence that:

- (A) Islam arrived early and peacefully through trade and settlement, not only through the later invasions
- (B) Arab merchants conquered the west coast by force of arms
- (C) the Siddis built places of worship after being freed from slavery
- (D) the Parsis adopted Islam soon after reaching Gujarat

27. The chapter treats 'Islam came peacefully with Arab traders' and 'Islam came through later invasions' as:

- (A) the same single event described in two different ways
- (B) proof that religions can spread only through conquest
- (C) two separate events, the peaceful trading arrival coming centuries earlier
- (D) evidence that Islam never spread by peaceful trade anywhere

28. The Mappila community of Kerala came into being when:

- (A) Tibetan refugees were given shelter in the 1950s
- (B) Arab merchants settled on the coast and married into local families
- (C) African people were brought to India enslaved
- (D) Polish children were sheltered during a war

29. A student argues, 'The Arab merchants and the Mappila prove every newcomer came by force.' The best correction is that they actually prove:

- (A) a community can form peacefully through trade and settlement, not only by force
- (B) religions and communities spread only through conquest
- (C) trade contacts never give rise to lasting communities
- (D) the Arab merchants were in fact brought to India enslaved

30. Comparing how the Mappila and the Siddi communities BEGAN, the key contrast is that:

- (A) the Mappila were brought enslaved, while the Siddis were free wealthy traders
- (B) both the Mappila and the Siddis began as conquering armies
- (C) the Mappila arose from free Arab traders who settled and married locally, while the Siddis were brought enslaved
- (D) both the Mappila and the Siddis fled religious persecution

31. Of all the communities in the chapter, the Siddis are unique chiefly because they:

- (A) were brought to India enslaved rather than coming by their own choice for refuge or trade
- (B) are the only community that managed to keep its original religion
- (C) are the only community whose faith is described as ancient
- (D) are the only traders who married into local families

32. The Siddis are of which origin, and how did they come to India?

- (A) Tibetan origin, arriving as refugees in the 1950s
- (B) African origin, brought enslaved between roughly the 7th and 19th centuries
- (C) Armenian origin, arriving freely as wealthy traders
- (D) Polish origin, sheltered as children during a war

33. Today the Siddis are recognised in India as a scheduled tribe. This recognition means they are:

- (A) a community the Constitution recognises for special support and protection
- (B) a community formally banned from settling anywhere in India
- (C) a foreign trading guild granted special tax privileges
- (D) a ruling dynasty with authority over an Indian state

34. From enslaved arrival to constitutional recognition as a scheduled tribe, the Siddi story best illustrates that India:

- (A) drew even a community brought enslaved into the protections of Indian society over time
- (B) welcomed only wealthy traders and rulers throughout its history
- (C) expelled communities that had arrived without choosing to come
- (D) kept enslaved-origin communities permanently outside its society

35. The Armenians and the Arab merchants are alike in the chapter because both communities:

- (A) fled religious persecution as refugees
- (B) came seeking opportunity through trade and settled in India
- (C) were brought to India enslaved against their will
- (D) arrived as refugees fleeing the dangers of a 20th-century war

36. The Armenians traded and settled yet built churches in India. This best supports the claim that newcomers who came for opportunity:

- (A) still kept their own faith and identity while becoming part of Indian society
- (B) always gave up their religion in exchange for trading rights
- (C) never put down lasting roots in the places where they traded
- (D) came only to conquer the regions in which they did business

37. The Baha'is are included in the chapter mainly to show that India's tradition of acceptance:

- (A) ended once the ancient communities had all arrived
- (B) continued into modern times and reached across different faiths
- (C) was extended only to communities that came to trade
- (D) applied to one single religion alone

38. Which pair of communities together BEST shows that India offered refuge and acceptance not only in ancient times but also in modern times?

- (A) the Baha'is and the Tibetan refugees
- (B) the Cochin Jews and the Syriac Christians
- (C) the Parsis and the Arab merchants
- (D) the Siddis and the Armenians

39. The 'Good Maharaja' is remembered in the chapter for an act that best exemplifies which value?

- (A) building India's oldest mosque for the Arab traders
- (B) founding Zoroastrianism for the Parsis
- (C) giving refuge to those fleeing danger, by sheltering Polish children during a war
- (D) recognising the Siddis as a scheduled tribe

40. The Polish children sheltered by the 'Good Maharaja' should be classified as:

- (A) traders who came seeking opportunity
- (B) an enslaved community brought against their will
- (C) refugees who fled the dangers of war
- (D) the original inhabitants of the region

41. The story of the 'Good Maharaja' and the Polish children connects most directly to which other example in the chapter, and why?

- (A) the Arab merchants, because both involve coming to India for trade
- (B) the Siddis, because both involve being brought to India enslaved
- (C) the Armenians, because both involve building churches in India
- (D) the Tibetan refugees, because both are cases of giving shelter to people fleeing danger

42. Sowa Rigpa, the Tibetan 'Art of Healing', is significant in the chapter because it:

- (A) replaced India's older systems of medicine entirely
- (B) was kept strictly secret within the Tibetan community
- (C) became part of India's AYUSH programme, showing that newcomers enriched India's knowledge
- (D) was abandoned by the Tibetans once they reached India

43. That Tibetan medicine joined India's AYUSH programme is used in the chapter mainly to refute which misconception?

- (A) that India ever sheltered refugees at all
- (B) that Sowa Rigpa is a religion rather than a system of medicine
- (C) that welcoming refugees adds nothing to, or even weakens, the host culture
- (D) that the Tibetans came to India to trade

44. The Tibetan refugees together with their Sowa Rigpa best illustrate the COMBINED idea that:

- (A) India admitted only traders who brought profitable goods
- (B) refugees must surrender their knowledge in order to be accepted
- (C) India gave refuge to a people fleeing danger, and that people then enriched Indian knowledge
- (D) newcomers always weaken the culture that receives them

45. In the chapter's vocabulary, 'persecution' is best understood as:

- (A) a warm welcome extended to newcomers arriving in a country
- (B) hostility and ill-treatment, often on religious, ethnic, social or political grounds
- (C) a formal agreement to trade between two communities
- (D) the shelter offered to those who are fleeing danger

46. 'Persecution' and 'refuge' are linked but opposite in a refugee's story. Which statement keeps them in the right relationship?

- (A) people flee refuge and seek persecution
- (B) refuge and persecution mean exactly the same thing
- (C) persecution is the shelter that a refugee is finally given
- (D) people flee persecution and seek refuge

47. To describe India as a 'cosmopolitan' civilisation, in this chapter's sense, is to say it has:

- (A) welcomed only wealthy traders and turned the poor away
- (B) been at home with people of many cultures, like 'a citizen of the world'
- (C) absorbed newcomers by erasing their original cultures
- (D) stayed loyal to a single culture above all others

48. 'Tolerance' and 'pluralism' are related ideas. The best way to distinguish them is that tolerance is more about the _____, while pluralism is more about the _____.

- (A) rejection of newcomers; rule of one community over the others
- (B) system of medicine practised by a people; main place of their worship
- (C) attitude of accepting and respecting different beliefs; condition of many communities coexisting in one society
- (D) act of leaving a country; act of entering a country

49. A people's 'ethos', as the word is used in the chapter, refers to their:

- (A) traditional system of healing and medicine
- (B) principal house of worship and assembly
- (C) characteristic spirit or guiding values — here, acceptance and openness
- (D) main goods carried along their trade routes

50. Match each term to its meaning: 'cosmopolitan', 'tolerance', 'ethos'. The correct set is:

- (A) cosmopolitan = a people's guiding spirit; tolerance = at home with many cultures; ethos = respecting different beliefs
- (B) cosmopolitan = respecting different beliefs; tolerance = a people's guiding spirit; ethos = at home with many cultures
- (C) cosmopolitan = a system of medicine; tolerance = a place of worship; ethos = a trade good
- (D) cosmopolitan = at home with many cultures; tolerance = respecting different beliefs; ethos = a people's guiding spirit

51. A student argues, 'Because refugees built synagogues, fire temples and churches of their own, they must have stayed apart and never really joined Indian society.' The best correction is that keeping their own places of worship actually shows:

- (A) they refused to settle and soon left India again
- (B) they integrated into Indian society while keeping their own identities
- (C) they gave up their faiths in order to fit into Indian society
- (D) they ruled over the older inhabitants of India

52. Which statement best captures the BALANCE the chapter strikes about how newcomers fit into India?

- (A) they fully assimilated, abandoning every trace of their origins
- (B) they neither stayed wholly apart nor dissolved entirely — they integrated while keeping their identities
- (C) they stayed completely separate, never mixing with Indian society
- (D) they took control of India and imposed their own ways on it

53. The clearest single piece of evidence in the chapter that newcomers kept their identities is that they:

- (A) were each given their own separate territory to rule
- (B) maintained distinct places of worship and languages while living within Indian society
- (C) all adopted a single common religion and language
- (D) left India whenever their own customs were questioned

54. A claim states, 'Welcoming so many communities must have weakened India's culture.' The chapter answers that diversity, on the contrary:

- (A) enriched Indian culture by adding foods, words, crafts, music and faiths
- (B) stripped away the older parts of Indian culture
- (C) left Indian culture exactly as it had always been
- (D) made all of India's communities culturally identical

55. Borrowed foods, words, crafts and music in everyday Indian life are offered in the chapter as concrete proof that:

- (A) a culture is destroyed whenever outsiders contribute to it
- (B) outside contributions leave a culture completely unchanged
- (C) only trade goods, and never culture, ever crossed into India
- (D) the mixing of many communities makes a culture richer, not poorer

56. Taken as a whole, the chapter's verdict on India's diversity of communities is that it is:

- (A) a weakness that left India vulnerable to outsiders
- (B) a problem best solved by removing its minority communities
- (C) a source of strength and richness, in the spirit of vasudhaiva kutumbakam
- (D) a matter of no real importance to India's story

57. A newcomer to India says, 'I had to leave my homeland because I was being attacked for my faith, and I was given shelter here.' Which two chapter terms best label what she fled and what she received?

- (A) she fled refuge and received persecution
- (B) she fled persecution and received refuge
- (C) she fled tolerance and received pluralism
- (D) she fled an ethos and received a synagogue

58. Three communities are listed: the Parsis, the Polish children and the Tibetans. What single label correctly fits ALL three?

- (A) they all came to India seeking opportunity through trade
- (B) they all came to India seeking refuge from persecution or danger
- (C) they were all brought to India enslaved against their will
- (D) they all arrived only in the 20th century

59. Consider four communities — the Cochin Jews, the Armenians, the Siddis and the Tibetans. Which statement correctly sorts ALL of them by how they came to India?

- (A) Jews and Tibetans came for refuge, Armenians for opportunity, and the Siddis were brought enslaved
- (B) all four came for opportunity through trade
- (C) Jews and Armenians came for refuge; Siddis and Tibetans came for opportunity
- (D) Siddis and Tibetans came for refuge; Jews and Armenians were brought enslaved

60. A student summarises the chapter in one line: 'Everyone came to India to trade, refugees lost their identities, and all this diversity weakened the culture.' How many of the three claims are correct, and what is the best overall correction?

- (A) all three claims are correct as stated
- (B) none are correct — many came as refugees or enslaved, communities kept their identities, and diversity enriched the culture
- (C) only the 'lost their identities' claim is correct
- (D) only the 'diversity weakened the culture' claim is correct

Worked Solutions

1. (D) The chapter dates the welcome back millennia: Arab merchants came in the 7th century and Jews even earlier, so 'only recently' is plainly wrong. The Tibetan and Baha'i arrivals are genuine modern examples, but they show the ethos CONTINUED into modern times, not that it BEGAN then. Scheduled-tribe recognition of the Siddis is a modern legal status laid over a community brought to India centuries ago; it dates the protection, not the arrival, and so does not establish a recent start.

2. (C) 'Atithi devo bhava' ('a guest is like God') honours the particular guest, whereas 'vasudhaiva kutumbakam' ('the whole world is one family') is the broader civilisational ideal embracing all humanity. The first distractor reverses the two scopes. Neither saying is a trade rule, so the second is false. And both are timeless values the chapter presents as guiding India across the ages, not split between ancient and modern eras.

3. (D) 'A home to many' captures India's characteristic spirit, or ethos, of acceptance that drew many communities over millennia. India is the receiver, not a conqueror dragging peoples home, so the first distractor inverts the relationship. Acceptance was not sold to paying traders only; refugees and even enslaved-origin communities were drawn in, refuting the second. And newcomers kept their own identities rather than melting into one Indian identity, so the third contradicts the chapter's core point.

4. (A) The chapter ties vasudhaiva kutumbakam to concrete enrichment: foods, words, crafts, music and faiths brought by newcomers broadened, not weakened, the culture, so welcoming outsiders strengthened it. The Siddis were not kept apart; they were drawn into society and constitutionally protected, so the first distractor misstates the evidence. Atithi devo bhava never demanded newcomers drop their customs, which contradicts the second. And India did not expel communities, so the pluralism pairing is false.

5. (D) The chapter projects the value forward: in a world where diverse peoples share space ever more closely, treating humanity as one family is a working principle for living together, which is exactly why modern examples like the Tibetans and Baha'is are cited. 'One family' means kinship, not one nation ruling others, so the first distractor twists it. The value addresses all of society, not traders alone, refuting the second. And the chapter calls it relevant NOW, not a dead relic, so the third reverses the point.

6. (D) Fleeing attack for one's beliefs is seeking refuge; chasing trade profit is seeking opportunity, so the order is refuge then opportunity. The first distractor reverses them. The second names persecution (the thing fled) and asylum (a synonym for refuge) rather than the two motive categories the chapter uses. And conquest is not one of the chapter's two paths, so the last is outside the framework.

7. (B) The Siddis break the model because they came by neither voluntary path: they were brought enslaved. The Parsis fit the model squarely as refuge-seekers and did not conquer, so the first is false. The Arab merchants came freely for trade, not under force, so the second misdescribes them. And the Tibetans came as refugees fleeing danger, not as rulers, so the third is wrong.

8. (D) The Polish children fled wartime danger and the Cochin Jews fled persecution, so both came for refuge; the Armenians traded and the Arab merchants who founded the Mappila community traded, so both came for opportunity. 'All four for trade' ignores the two refuge cases. The third option misfiles the Armenians as refugees and the Jews as traders. And none of these four were enslaved, so the last is false.

9. (C) The chapter's core distinction is choice: a refugee is pushed out by danger or persecution and has little real choice, while the immigrant comes freely seeking opportunity. Keeping traditions was open to all newcomers, so the first distractor invents a false limit. Refugees did join Indian society, the Tibetans, Parsis and Jews among them, so the second is false. And both refugees and immigrants appear across ancient and modern times, so the era split in the third is invented.

10. (A) To emigrate is to leave a country and to immigrate is to enter one, so leaving Persia is emigrating and entering India is immigrating. The first distractor swaps the two directions. A single move is naturally both an emigration from the old land and an immigration into the new, so the 'cannot also be' claim is false. And a refugee fleeing persecution is precisely a kind of migrant, so 'not migration' is wrong.

11. (C) The Tibetans fled danger and were sheltered, so 'refuge from danger' is the right match. The Siddis did not come for trade; they were brought enslaved, so the first distractor is false. The Parsis came for refuge from persecution, not trade, so the second misfiles them. And the Arab merchants came freely for trade, not as persecuted refugees, so the third reverses their motive.

12. (D) The Siddis fit neither voluntary path because they were brought enslaved, revealing that involuntary arrival is a third reality the simple two-path model leaves out. The Parsis chose refuge and settled rather than ruled, so the first is false. The Armenians came to trade, not to conquer, so the second is wrong. And because the Siddis genuinely break the model, 'none of the three' is false.

13. (C) The synagogue is the Jewish house of worship, the fire temple is the Zoroastrian (Parsi) one, and the church belongs to Christian communities such as the Armenians and Syriac Christians, so all three differ. The first distractor swaps synagogue and fire temple and wrongly assigns the church to the enslaved-origin Siddis. The second hands these buildings to Arab Muslims, Tibetan Buddhists and Parsis, none of whom owns them. And the third scrambles all three assignments.

14. (B) The Bene Israel and Cochin Jews are two of India's Jewish communities, both preserving their faith and building synagogues. African-origin enslaved arrivals describe the Siddis, not the Jews, so the first is false. The Kerala Muslim community formed by Arab settlers is the Mappila, refuting the second. And Zoroastrian fire-temple builders in Gujarat are the Parsis, so the third names the wrong faith entirely.

15. (D) Surviving synagogues alongside full participation in Indian life is the model of identity-preserving integration. It refutes the idea that acceptance demanded giving up one's religion, so the first is false. It refutes total separation, since the Jews were part of Indian society, so the second is wrong. And it has nothing to do with ruling the older inhabitants; the theme is coexistence, not domination, so the third is off-point.

16. (D) The Syriac Christians are among the world's oldest Christian communities, proving Christianity's roots in India are ancient. They did not first arrive in the 20th century, refuting the first. They were not introduced by the African-origin Siddis, who are a separate community, so the second is false. And while the Armenians were also Christians, Christianity in India is not limited to them; the Syriac Christians are a distinct, older Kerala community, so the third is wrong.

17. (A) Both are old communities that kept their faith while integrating, the chapter's model of identity-preserving integration. Neither was enslaved; that path belongs to the Siddis, so the first is false. Neither came as a conquering army, so the second is wrong. And the entire point is that they KEPT their religions, so the claim that they abandoned them in the third is the opposite of the truth.

18. (A) The Syriac Christians group with communities such as the Jews and Parsis who settled and preserved their faith, an instance of identity-preserving integration. They did not conquer Kerala, refuting the first. They did not abandon their religion; preserving it is the point, so the second is false. And they were not enslaved; that was the Siddis, so the third misclassifies their arrival.

19. (A) Zarathushtra was the human prophet who founded Zoroastrianism; the one God worshipped is Ahura Mazda. The first distractor swaps prophet and God. Zoroastrianism worships one God, not many gods of nature, so the second is false. And Zarathushtra was the faith's ancient founder, not an Arab merchant who began it in India, so the third confuses two unrelated figures and places the founding in the wrong land.

20. (D) Zoroastrianism is one of the oldest religions, worships one God (Ahura Mazda) and emphasises choosing good over evil. It is neither new nor polytheistic, so the first is false. It is not a branch of Judaism, and the synagogue is the Jewish house of worship, not the Zoroastrian fire temple, refuting the second. And it is a religion, not a healing system; Sowa Rigpa is the Tibetan 'Art of Healing', so the third confuses two different things.

21. (C) The Parsis fled persecution (refuge) and settled in Gujarat while keeping their fire temples, combining refuge with identity-preserving integration. They did not come to trade or rule Gujarat, so the first is false. The enslaved-then-scheduled-tribe story is the Siddis', not the Parsis', refuting the second. And the Parsis are an ancient arrival, unlike the 20th-century Tibetan refugees, so the third misdates them.

22. (A) The Parsis settled mainly in Gujarat and are marked by their fire temples, while the Jews are associated with their synagogues. The first distractor swaps the houses of worship, giving the Jews fire temples and the Parsis synagogues. Tibet and monasteries belong to the Tibetan refugees, so the second is wrong. And Armenia and churches belong to the Armenians, so the third misassigns both markers.

23. (D) The Parsis fled persecution seeking refuge, which directly breaks the 'all came to trade' claim. They did not conquer or rule Gujarat, so the first is false. They were not enslaved; that path belongs to the Siddis, refuting the second. And far from refusing to settle, they put down lasting roots and kept their fire temples, so the third is wrong.

24. (D) Zoroastrianism is among the oldest religions and the Syriac Christians prove Christianity's ancient roots in Kerala, so the first option is correct on both counts. The first distractor reverses the age of Zoroastrianism and misdates Christianity. Islam reached the west coast peacefully through Arab merchants from the 7th century, before the later invasions, so the second is false. And the faiths span ancient to modern, not 20th century alone, so the last is wrong.

25. (B) Islam first reached India peacefully with Arab traders on the west coast from the 7th century, distinct from and earlier than the later military invasions, which is exactly the misconception being corrected. It did not first appear in the 20th century, refuting the first distractor. It was not brought by the Siddis, who have a separate African-origin history, so the second is false. And the early arrival was by peaceful trade, not sea conquest, so the third is wrong.

26. (A) The oldest mosque, raised where Arab traders settled, is concrete proof that Islam came early and peacefully by trade, not solely by the later invasions. It was not the fruit of conquest, refuting the first. It was built by Arab Muslim settlers, not by the African-origin Siddis, so the second is false. And the Parsis kept their Zoroastrian faith rather than adopting Islam, so the third is simply untrue.

27. (C) The chapter keeps these as two distinct events, with the peaceful 7th-century trading arrival coming centuries before the later invasions. They are not one event, so the first distractor is false. The peaceful arrival actually disproves 'spread only by conquest', refuting the second. And it shows Islam DID spread by trade, contradicting the third.

28. (B) The Mappila are the Kerala Muslim community that formed as Arab merchants settled and married locally, an opportunity-driven trade arrival that produced a lasting community. The Tibetan-refugee shelter, the enslaved African Siddis and the Polish-children rescue are three separate stories about entirely different communities, so each remaining option describes a different group's history.

29. (A) The Arab merchants who settled and the Mappila who grew from them show a community forming peacefully through trade and intermarriage, the opposite of 'by force'. So they disprove 'spread only by conquest', refuting the first. They also show trade CAN create lasting communities, contradicting the second. And the Arab merchants came freely for opportunity, not enslaved like the Siddis, so the third is false.

30. (C) The Mappila grew from free Arab traders who settled and intermarried, whereas the Siddis were brought to India enslaved, a fundamental contrast of choice. The first distractor reverses the two. Neither began as a conquering army, refuting the second. And neither is described as fleeing religious persecution; that motive fits the Parsis and Jews, so the third is wrong.

31. (A) The Siddis stand out for arriving enslaved, by no voluntary path, unlike the refugee-seekers and traders. Keeping one's original faith was true of many communities, such as the Jews and Parsis, so the first is not unique to them. An ancient faith also fits the Zoroastrians and others, refuting the second. And marrying into local families describes the Arab merchants and the Mappila, not the enslaved Siddis, so the third is misattributed.

32. (B) The Siddis are of African origin and were brought to India enslaved over a long span from about the 7th to the 19th centuries. Tibetan refugees of the 1950s, Armenian traders and Polish wartime children are three separate communities, each with a different origin and a different reason for being in India, so none of the remaining options describes the Siddis.

33. (A) A scheduled tribe is a community the Indian Constitution recognises for special support and protection, the Siddis' modern status. It is the opposite of a ban on settling, since the recognition treats them as citizens deserving help, refuting the first. They are an Indian community of African descent, not a foreign trading guild, so the second is false. And the status confers protective support, not ruling power, so the third is wrong.

34. (A) The Siddis began enslaved yet are now a scheduled tribe with constitutional protection, showing India eventually brought even an involuntarily-arrived community into society's protections. This contradicts the idea that only wealthy traders were welcome, so the first is false. It contradicts expelling the involuntarily-arrived, refuting the second. And it contradicts keeping such communities permanently outside; the opposite happened, so the third is wrong.

35. (B) Both the Armenians and the Arab merchants came for opportunity through trade and settled, the Armenians even building churches. Neither fled persecution as refugees; that fits the Parsis, Jews and Tibetans, so the first is false. Neither was enslaved like the Siddis, refuting the second. And neither was a 20th-century war refugee; that describes the Polish children and the Tibetans, so the third is wrong.

36. (A) The Armenians built churches while trading and settling, showing even opportunity-seekers kept their faith and identity while joining Indian society, the same pattern as the refugee communities. They did not trade away their religion, refuting the first. Building churches signals lasting roots, not their absence, so the second is false. And trading and settling is the opposite of conquering, so the third is wrong.

37. (B) The Baha'is, who also came seeking acceptance, show India's openness continuing into modern times and embracing diverse faiths. Acceptance did not end with the ancient communities, so the first is false. It was not limited to traders, since the Baha'is and Tibetans were not traders, refuting the second. And it spanned many religions, from Jews and Christians to Zoroastrians, Muslims and Baha'is, so the third is wrong.

38. (A) The Baha'is and the Tibetan refugees are the chapter's clearest modern examples of continuing acceptance and refuge. The Cochin Jews and Syriac Christians are ancient communities, so the first pair misses the 'modern' point. The Parsis (ancient refuge) and Arab merchants (early trade) are also old arrivals, refuting the second. And the Siddis' enslaved arrival spanned earlier centuries while the Armenians were earlier traders, so the third pair does not make the modern point.

39. (C) The 'Good Maharaja' sheltered Polish children fleeing wartime danger, a clear act of giving refuge. He did not build India's oldest mosque; that traces to the Arab merchants, so the first is false. He did not found Zoroastrianism; the prophet Zarathushtra did, long before, refuting the second. And recognising the Siddis as a scheduled tribe is a modern constitutional act, not the Maharaja's deed, so the third is wrong.

40. (C) The Polish children fled wartime danger and were sheltered, so they were refugees. They sought safety, not trade profit, so the opportunity label in the first is wrong. They were sheltered out of compassion, not brought enslaved like the Siddis, refuting the second. And they came from far away during the war, so they were certainly not original inhabitants, making the third false.

41. (D) Both the Polish children and the Tibetan refugees are instances of India sheltering people fleeing danger, the same value of refuge. The Arab merchants came for trade, an opportunity case, so the first link fails. The Siddis were enslaved, a wholly different arrival, refuting the second. And church-building belongs to the Armenians' trade-and-identity story, not to giving refuge, so the third is off-point.

42. (C) Sowa Rigpa joined India's AYUSH programme, showing a refugee community enriching Indian knowledge. It was added alongside, not in place of, India's older systems, so the first is false. Being included in AYUSH means it was shared, not kept secret, refuting the second. And it was preserved and nationally recognised rather than abandoned, so the third is wrong.

43. (C) Sowa Rigpa entering AYUSH proves refugees can enrich the host culture, refuting the idea that they add nothing or weaken it. The chapter affirms, rather than denies, that India sheltered refugees, so the first is not the misconception addressed. The point is not to settle whether Sowa Rigpa is a religion; it is a medical system, so the second is beside the point. And the Tibetans came for refuge, not trade, making the third a separate matter.

44. (C) The Tibetans were given refuge and then contributed Sowa Rigpa to Indian medicine, combining refuge with cultural enrichment. India did not admit only profitable traders; it sheltered refugees who brought no trade goods, refuting the first. Refugees did not have to surrender their knowledge; they shared it through AYUSH, so the second is false. And the example shows enrichment, not weakening, contradicting the third.

45. (B) Persecution is hostility and ill-treatment, often for religious or other reasons, exactly what many refugees fled. It is the opposite of a warm welcome, so the first is false. It is not a trade agreement, refuting the second. And shelter offered to the endangered is refuge or asylum, which is what persecuted people SEEK, not the persecution itself, so the third confuses the two ends of the refugee's story.

46. (D) A refugee flees persecution (ill-treatment) and seeks refuge (shelter), the correct cause-and-response. Reversing them, fleeing shelter to seek ill-treatment, makes no sense, so the first is false. They are opposites, not synonyms, refuting the second. And persecution is the danger fled, not the shelter given; calling persecution 'the shelter' in the third confuses the two ends of the journey.

47. (B) 'Cosmopolitan' means at home with many cultures, a 'citizen of the world', exactly the openness the chapter describes. India was not selective by wealth, sheltering refugees and enslaved-origin communities too, so the first is false. It did not erase newcomers' cultures; they kept their identities, refuting the second. And clinging to a single culture is the closed attitude the chapter argues against, so the third is the opposite of cosmopolitan.

48. (C) Tolerance is the attitude of accepting and respecting beliefs different from one's own, while pluralism is the social condition of many communities actually coexisting, an attitude versus a state of society. Both are positive, not about rejection or domination, so the first is false. Neither concerns medicine or worship, refuting the second. And leaving or entering a country is emigrate or immigrate, an unrelated pair, so the third is wrong.

49. (C) Ethos means the characteristic spirit or guiding values of a people, for India the spirit of acceptance the chapter describes. It is not a system of medicine, which would suggest Sowa Rigpa, so the first is false. It is not a place of worship such as a synagogue or fire temple, refuting the second. And it is not trade goods, so the third is wrong; ethos is about values, not healing, buildings or commerce.

50. (D) Cosmopolitan means at home with many cultures, tolerance means respecting different beliefs, and ethos means a people's guiding spirit, the only correctly matched set. The first and second distractors each shuffle these three definitions onto the wrong words. And the third assigns medicine, worship and trade, none of which matches any of the three social terms.

51. (B) Building synagogues, fire temples and churches while becoming part of Indian life is identity-preserving integration; keeping their identities did not mean staying apart. The buildings prove lasting settlement, so 'refused to settle' in the first is false. Keeping these houses of worship is the opposite of giving up their faiths, refuting the second. And it has nothing to do with ruling the older inhabitants; the theme is coexistence, not domination, so the third is wrong.

52. (B) The chapter's balanced claim is identity-preserving integration: newcomers joined Indian society yet kept their faiths, languages and customs, neither total assimilation nor total separation. Full assimilation, losing all origins, overshoots one way, so the first is false. Complete separation overshoots the other, refuting the second. And taking control of India misreads coexistence as conquest, so the third is wrong; the middle path is the chapter's actual position.

53. (B) Surviving synagogues, fire temples, churches and languages are the chapter's clearest proof that newcomers kept their identities while living within Indian society. They were not handed separate territories to rule, so the first is false. Adopting one common religion and language would be LOSING their identities, refuting the second. And they settled permanently rather than leaving when questioned, so the third is wrong.

54. (A) The chapter argues diversity enriched Indian culture, adding foods, words, crafts, music and faiths, directly refuting the 'weakened' claim. It did not strip away older culture; it added to it, so the first is false. It did not leave culture unchanged; the borrowings are visible changes, refuting the second. And it did not make communities identical; distinct communities coexisted while contributing, so the third is wrong.

55. (D) Everyday borrowed foods, words, crafts and music show that mixing communities enriches a culture rather than impoverishing it. These contributions became part of Indian life rather than destroying it, so the first is false. They are visible changes, not an unchanged culture, refuting the second. And the borrowings show that language, cuisine, crafts and music crossed into India, far more than trade goods, so the third is wrong.

56. (C) The chapter's overall verdict is that diversity is a source of strength and richness, in keeping with vasudhaiva kutumbakam. It is not a weakness that left India vulnerable; the evidence shows enrichment, so the first is false. It is not a problem to be solved by removing minorities; pluralism preserves them, refuting the second. And it is certainly not unimportant; diversity is the chapter's central, valued theme, so the third is wrong.

57. (B) Being attacked for one's faith is persecution, and the shelter she was given is refuge, so she fled persecution and received refuge. Reversing them, fleeing shelter and receiving ill-treatment, makes no sense, so the first is false. Tolerance and pluralism are positive values of the host society, not things one flees or receives as shelter, refuting the second. And an ethos is a guiding spirit while a synagogue is a Jewish house of worship; neither labels what she fled or the shelter she got, so the third is wrong.

58. (B) The Parsis fled persecution, and the Polish children and Tibetans fled danger, so all three came seeking refuge. None came for trade, so the opportunity label in the first is false. None was brought enslaved; that path fits only the Siddis, refuting the second. And the Parsis are an ancient arrival while only the Polish children and Tibetans are modern, so 'all in the 20th century' in the third is wrong.

59. (A) The Jews fled persecution and the Tibetans fled danger (refuge), the Armenians traded (opportunity), and the Siddis were brought enslaved, the only fully correct sort. 'All four for trade' ignores the refugees and the enslaved Siddis, so the first is false. The second misfiles the Armenians as refugees and the Siddis and Tibetans as traders. And labelling the Jews and Armenians as enslaved is plainly wrong, since that path belongs only to the Siddis, so the third is false.

60. (B) All three claims are wrong, so the count is none. Not everyone came to trade; the Parsis, Jews and Tibetans fled persecution or danger, and the Siddis were brought enslaved. Refugees did not lose their identities; they kept synagogues, fire temples, churches and languages. And diversity did not weaken the culture; it enriched it with foods, words, crafts, music and faiths. Each 'only this one is correct' option still endorses a refuted misconception, so all three distractors are false.
